No. 192.—Vol. VIII.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, JANUARY 3, 1846. [Sixpence.

THE OLD YEAR AND THE NEW.

The unresting shadow on the dial of Time has again completed its circle; and, careless as we are of the lapse of weeks and months, there are few who do not pause with some degree of reflection, when that shadow has marked the revolution of a year. No man does the parting year leave as it found him, but changed—often, it may be hoped, for the better—still oftener, it may be feared, for the worse. Of little account as a year may be in the history of a nation, even on a whole people it frequently exercises a mighty influence. A few days have changed a dynasty, overturned a throne that stood on the foundation of centuries, and forced on the lips of those who "dwelt in Kings' houses" the bitter bread of exile. A few weeks have witnessed whole nations overrun by hostile hosts, spoiled and devastated, and, save in memory, blotted from the map of kingdoms.

The smaller sections of time may work in ourselves, and all about us, an inexpressible change; but those of the larger almost defy comprehension. From history alone can we gather the mutations of a century. To comparatively few of the children of men is it given to see those of half that space; and, even then, the gathering coldness of age makes them often think every change they remember has been one for the worse. A long lapse of time confounds events with each other, and renders all dim and indistinct; but the incidents of a shorter period memory can recall with the utmost vividness. That retrospection is often forced on the most indifferent, and at no time more seriously than when we stand between the Old Year and the New.

The closing days of the Old Year have been marked by political changes as extraordinary as they were unexpected. The Peel Ministry, that seemed "whole as the marble, founded as the rock," was suddenly broken up, and its weak opponents called on to supply its place. But they could not perform the task: whether it was personal quarrels among the leaders, or difference upon points of policy, matters not—the attempt of the Whigs to form a Government was a failure. What produced the crisis? We believe it to have been the political foresight of the Premier, that enables him to perceive more clearly than his fellows, that the time has come when a complicated and restrictive system of commerce cannot be maintained; cities and towns that, a generation ago, could be numbered by thousands, are growing to millions: they must be fed, at all hazards; and, to be fed, they must be employed. To govern such masses is an awful responsibility; and with such an enormous comparative population to deal with, the mere shadow of approaching or impending scarcity, compels rulers to act. They cannot sit still with folded arms, and say, we can do nothing. There is an imperious necessity behind them driving them forward. It is that necessity, seen by the Premier, but, perhaps, escaping the observation of his colleagues, that has caused the breaking up of the Cabinet. We believe him, firmly, to be far above any of the lower influences that make statesmen tenacious of office for its own sake; but that he loves the power, the position, and the place in history, that the de facto ruler of England must always possess, is apparent. Would he sacrifice all these for a danger that existed only in imagination? It is very usual, among many of his own party, to attempt to prove that the fear is unfounded; we dare say the Premier would be but too happy to be able to entertain the same opinion.

The responsibility of office obliges a man to see things under a very different aspect from those who have little or no anxiety about results; who, at all events, are not answerable for them should they prove disastrous. It is these social difficulties, always interwoven with commercial questions, that have of late years become more and more pressing; they have now grown to be the stumbling-block of Ministries and Cabinets. Formerly, we have seen Governments overthrown on questions of religious and political principle; the Church, the Tithes, the Franchise, have all been questions on which power has been gained and lost; but that a Cabinet should be overthrown on what is intrinsically but a question of the policy of trade, of the working of commerce, and the effect of the intercourse of nations, was reserved for the departing year, 1845. The question may be considered as having reached its culminating point; it must now, of necessity, approach nearer and nearer to its solution. Whether that decision will be satisfactory or not depends on the degree of wisdom and courage with which those who have the power in their hands may meet it; but that it cannot be distant is certain. The suddenness with which a remedy is applied often bears no proportion to the time the evil has existed; the old close borough system arose from the natural changes of centuries causing one place to rise and flourish while another went to decay. But within the compass of two years came the storm that swept the whole system away, destroying the mockeries of representation and establishing the reality in its place. The policy commenced in 1842 may probably find its completion in 1846.

But there is nothing certain, save the irrevocable past; though we do not, like Hamlet, absolutely "defy augury," yet we hold it to be—in the movements of politicians especially—unprofitable: leaving the future, then, to that past let us return.

Perhaps the best peculiarity of the past year is, that it stands distinguished by no striking, or, what History would register as a great event. These are so often found to have been great calamities—wars, battles, revolutions, and other chances that must have been accompanied with intense human suffering—that men should always congratulate themselves when they are furnished with no opportunity of giving what is called a brilliant, but which is really a bloody page to their chronicles. Let us welcome our future obscurity with thankfulness, since it denotes that we had that "peace in our time," which should be one of the first objects of the Christian's prayer. This calamity we have at least been spared—may it long be spared us! The past year opened for us amid general tranquillity, and in peace we meet its successor. For thirty years the nations of Europe have not turned their arms against each other, to the great increase of the happiness and prosperity of all of them. The lesson of the last great conflict has not been forgotten; and though they have not yet shaken off mutual jealousies, nor are yet able to dispense with those formidable bodies of trained force, which still denote war to be a possibility, yet we hope that the moderation of rulers, the decrease of that mania for regulating the Governments of other people which once possessed all the powerful Courts of Europe, and, still more, the effects of closer communication and the better knowledge of each other that it brings, will continue to keep this great evil from again infecting the world with its miserable madness. Within the last few years, questions have arisen which there can be little doubt would have kindled the flame of destruction between people and people; yet they have been settled amicably, with no disadvantage to either party. So may it be for the future; so, we trust, will the "little cloud" that has arisen between us and America pass away. War between two such people seems too hideous to be contemplated; we are kindred in blood and language, and war, "foul as in the best it is," would, between them, be, indeed, "most foul, strange, and unnatural."

Notwithstanding the fears and perplexities that have darkened the closing days of the departed year, it has had its share of brightness too. Whatever may be anticipated, no general calamity has fallen on us; the year cannot be termed other than a prosperous one. The population has been employed and fed, whatever may be the fears as to the supply of labour and food for the future. Indeed, the nation has displayed an energy that could only have arisen from the consciousness of possessing mighty resources. Abused as the spirit of enterprise has been, by mere schemers and sharpers, still what other country in the world could undertake such gigantic operations as the railways that there is no doubt will be carried to completion? Even after the disappearance of those bubbles already exploded, and of those that will not be approved by the legal authority, enough will be left to task the wealth of every nation of Europe to the utmost, while England will accomplish them with ease; and yet have a vast sum to spare for the assistance of her neighbours. We no longer squander our wealth in war, that great gulf which would absorb more than human effort could accumulate. The vast increase of her funds, secured by the untiring industry of England, enables her to do what others could not dream of attempting. That speculation may be, and has been carried to excess cannot be denied; but the mischief is passing away; the returning confidence of the public shows that the development of our internal communications is the best purpose to which capital can be applied. A new stage in that progress, a new railway era, may be dated from 1845.

The transition from the old year to the new is marked by a suspension of that political excitement which a short time ago prevailed. But the most anxious expectation still exists; and the opening of the Session of 1846 is looked forward to with extraordinary interest. Are we really entering on a new era, or only going to find a modification that can scarcely be called a change of an old one? The oracles are perversely silent, but the first moon of the New Year will not have "changed her horns" before some certain indications must be given; let them be given in good faith and honesty of purpose, and there can be no fear of the result.

Through whole ages of bad Government the native energy of Englishmen has risen triumphant, elastic beyond the power of all the weight of ignorance in its rulers to keep down. When we look back on the public corruption and personal profligacy of statesmen and rulers for the hundred and fifty years preceding the opening of the present century, we may well congratulate ourselves on the change for the better that later years exhibit. It would be impossible for any man to attain a high political position in this country whose public motives were suspected or private character impeached. The tone of public morals is higher than of old, and the pettiness of mere party intrigue is abandoned; the theories of Government now must be founded on the general welfare of the people. In this and the indomitable energy of the people themselves lie the best of hopes; may the NEW YEAR see their fulfilment!

THE GOVERNMENT OFFICES, DOWNING-STREET.

We resume our illustrations of these Establishments with a view of Downing-street, a very "nook and corner" of office. The first plain-fronted house on the right is the office of the First Lord of the TREASURY. Here, too, are the office of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the Colonial Department; and the Foreign Office, occupying Nos. 15, 16, and 17. The whole place, a cul de sac, if it lack architectural pretension, has, at least, the welcome quiet of a retreat; though subject to the insolations incident to the possession of power and place.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

The great event of the week has been the opening of the Legislative Session by the King in person. The principal hall was disposed for the Royal reception. The King looked exceedingly well, though he is evidently getting older, and the Royal Family appeared in excellent spirits. The diplomatic tribune was entirely filled by the diplomatic body; that of the public was filled by elegantly dressed females. The Pope's Nuncio, the Ambassador of Austria, and the Turkish Chargé d'Affaires, were present; our Ambassador, Lord Cowley, was absent, in consequence of an accident which he had met with. Among the most striking features in this scene was an Indian, dressed in the most superb style. His diamonded dagger and splendid cashmeres were quite dazzling: he was the very type of Eugene Sue's Djalma.

At one o'clock precisely the cannonading of the Invalides resounded through the air, the usual signal for Louis Philippe to leave the Tuileries. He was accompanied by his four sons. The National Guard formed a line on the right of the King; at the left were the troops of the line. His Majesty was observed to turn out, with loud acclamations. The Queen entered her tribune, bidding by the hand the Comte de Paris, and was received with enthusiastic cries of "Vive la Reine!" Then followed the Duchess of Orleans, the Duchess de Nemours, the Princess de Joinville, the Duchess d'Aumale, and the Princess Adelaide. The Peers, as usual, occupied the seats on the right section: those on the left, were filled with upwards of three hundred and fifty Deputies, all dressed in full black. The deputations of the Council of State, and the great dignitaries of the Legion of Honour, were seated at the back of the throne. On each side of the throne were the Ministers; Soult looked worried, and Guizot anxious. The King wore the uniform of the National Guard, the Dukes de Nemours and Aumale the uniforms of lieutenant-generals, the Prince de Joinville that of vice-admiral, and the Duke de Montpensier that of the chief of the squadron of artillery. At a signal given by him the King, the audience seated themselves. Then the Speech was given. It went off capitally, and was admirably delivered—plain, sensible, and clear. There were three rounds of applause during its enunciation. At the departure of the Royal Family, shouts echoed through the several halls. The cortége returned in the same order to the Tuileries, amidst the reports of fresh salvos of artillery.

A rather curious circumstance occurred to Halevy the composer a few days since. The composer had been directing the rehearsals of his new opera, which is shortly to be produced at the Opera Comique. Amidst every appearance of a romance had excited considerable enthusiasm. Returning to his residence full of the pleasurable emotions elicited by flattering applause, on mounting the stairs, he suddenly stopped, a prey to the most lively anxiety. A sudden cloud darkened his previously sunny brow. What could have caused the sudden change? Above his head sat perched a carpenter, humming a romance—the very melody which had obtained so marked a success at the rehearsal. Was this inexplicable chance could one of his most valued motives become known to the said carpenter? Could the composition which he believed to be the most orig nal of his work be but a reminiscence—an involuntary plagiarism which had fixed itself upon his memory? Addressing the singer, he inquired of him how long he had known the air he had been singing, and where he had learnt it. "Isn't it charming?" why, the fact is, I have been at work at restoring the theatre of the Opera Comique, and have been at a good many of the rehearsals of the new opera, and this tune appeared to me so pretty, and pleased me so much, that I can't drive it out of my head for the life of me." The face of Halevy soon gained its former pleasant expression, and he gave the man a five-franc piece, as a testimony of his refined taste and melodic appreciation. Among the various squibs which appeared on the subject of the Duke of Wellington's forbidding smoking in the mess-room, the following has appeared:—

SMOKING PROCLAMATION.

SOLDIERS,—All the misfortunes which have occurred to the army since the drowning of Pharaoh and his troops in the bottle of Aboukir, have resulted directly from the use of smoking tobacco. Eve was tempted by a cigar; and all the evils which have afflicted human nature came from the pipe of Pandora, which people have called a box. Be careful then!

A true soldier knows but the smoke of glory. Who now smokes? Savoyards and chimneys. The envised world now repudiates Maryland, and eschews Virginia. The use of the pipe is limited to the canaille employed in indoors scrubbing and red-bricking—humiliating for the brave men who trail the pike or carry the musket!

Spitting excites thirst—thirst, drinking: there may be exceptions, but they are rare. Thirst provokes an appetite for liquids, and the liquids of the pot-house are ordinarily Old Tom and heavy-wet, ale and hot punch.

Old Tom, heavy wet, ale, and hot punch, are excellent things in themselves, but when in the head they lead to follies the excited warriors. Two comrades seize each other's noses, then they clutch the hair, and then they are marched off to the guard-house. They meet the corporal on the way, who corrects, smacks, and damns the officers. This conduct, out of all rules of discipline, causes their being carried before a court-martial, which condemns them to the lash or to death. Their comrades of the regiment, in the fine, are obliged to buy and make Scotch kilts of their respectable trousers, and shout, "Huzza, O'Connell! and down with Wellington."

They fight, they kill, they mutiny, and there is no longer an army, no longer fit them out, and borrowed three pounds, as he said, to pay for the goods. This he said, he would return to him in the morning, but from that time to the present he had not got it back. This and other circumstances induced him (witness) to make inquiries about Mr Mead, the acceptor of the bill placed in his hands for security, and discovered that it was mere waste paper. He next made application to an attorney, who recommended him to give the prisoner into custody on a charge of fraud. He, in consequence, went to the residence of the prisoner, Hope Cottage, Mull-street, Lambeth, and, on seeing him, he asked if he was going to return his money and bill? He replied that he could not do so then, but should in a fortnight, when he then gave him into custody.

In reply to the questions of Mr. Henry, the witness said he had made inquiries at 43, Moorgate-street, about the prisoner, and was told there that he had merely occupied an apartment there, and had nothing whatever to do with the railway company there, though he wrote his letters upon the paper belonging to the company, and having this description in copper-plate at the top. His (witness) himself had called at the Stamp Office, and searched for Mead and Co., but could find no such railways as those mentioned by the prisoner on the list.

William Grant, who described himself as a clerk to Mr. Roching, a solicitor, said he had made inquiries about the prisoner, and found that in fact he was a regular railway stag, and the prisoner it appeared carried on an extensive business in the bill-drawing and accepting way.

The prisoner, in reply to the charge, said his name was Benjamin Brown, and that he was in the service of Mr. Aquila, who had formerly been a Spanish merchant, but was now a civil engineer and projector of railways. His offices were at 94, Cheapside, 4, Charlotte-street, Manchin Horse-street, and 43, Moorgate-street, the latter being the principal office; and prisoner was employed to carry messages to and from the directors. By business he was a carpenter and builder, but had not done anything at his trade for some time. He had not returned at the Adelphi Theatre three years ago, and paid as much as £300 a year for it. He had previously lived at 35, Duke-street, Adelphi, of which house he had a lease, and afterwards bought and sold furniture at 310, Strand. The prisoner mentioned the names of several railway projectors, to whom he said he had been well known, and concluded by declaring he had not told the prosecutor nor his witness that the railways projected by him were registered, but merely said he was about to register them.—The prisoner was remanded till Monday

On that day no was again examined, when some confirmatory evidence was given, and the case was remanded to a future day, Mr. Henry intimating that he should commit for the obtainment of money by false pretences.

At the close of the proceedings a showily-dressed young man presented himself as a volunteer witness, handing in his card, inscribed Sir Francis Smith, Bart. He stated that the prisoner Brown had been employed by his brother merely as a "railway inquirer,"—that is a person who inquired into the position of persons app ying for allotments Witness said, with an air of importance, that he himself followed the same pursuit. It turned out that he had a short time ago belonged to the metropolitan police.

On Wednesday the prisoner Brown was again examined. Some correspondence and other evidence were adduced, but there was nothing material in each.

Mr. Games asked the prosecutor if anything particular took place on the occasion of his paying the prisoner £50, at No. 43, Moorgate-street?—Prosecutor: Yes: the prisoner, while he was telling the fifty sovereigns on the desk, requested I would not make a noise

Mr Games: He seemed afraid that the other projectors of railroad schemes in the adjoining rooms would hear the pleasing sound of the gold?—Prosecutor: He seemed so.

Mr. Gunnis: Did anything else happen about the room door?—Prosecutor Yes; the prisoner took the key out of the door, and shut the small hall door softly, before I began to pay him the money.

Mr. Henry: And all this did not excite your suspicion?—Prosecutor: No, sir, unfortunately it did not.

Mr. Henry here said he should commit the prisoner to take his trial for receiving the money under false pretences.

THE DASHING SWINDLER KELLY.—This individual, who, under the name of Captain Kelly, has swindled vast numbers of persons, was re-examined at MARLEBONE office, last Monday As account of his previous examination appeared in our paper last week. On Monday the following additional evidence was adduced:—Mrs Oakey stated that she was a widow, and that one day in August last, and while the prisoner was her lodger, she missed a gold watch from a trunk in her room. She mentioned the circumstance to him, and he kept coming down stairs soon after the discovery of her loss, said to her, "You look very pale; what's the matter?" She then told him she had lost her husband's watch. He then went away, and finding some pawnbroker's duplicates in a drawer she went into his room, when she missed the razor she had lent him —Mr Driscoll, pawnbroker, Lower Jo n-street, Golden-square, produced the gold case of a watch pledged by the prisoner on the 4th of September last, in the name of John Mead, 8, Boyd-street; shortly after the pawning he (the prisoner) came again to the shop, said he had lost the ticket, and upon his applying for a duplicate for a declaration of the loss of it, a printed form was given him —Sergeant Gray produced the said declaration, which he found amongst other property at the prisoner's apartment in Boyle-street, Mrs. Oakey identified the case as being hers, and said that the watch which it formed a part had been in her family upwards of forty years.—Prisoner: I know nothing about the watch.—He had before denied having seen the razor, and asserted that the spoon which he took by accident was that of the female without his authority —Mr. Bardell, a wine and spirit merchant at Chisham, said that some time ago the prisoner and his so-called wife took of Mrs. Richardson, Gadshill, Kent, a furnished cottage for a month. Another gentleman said that the prisoner had obtained from Messrs. Storr and Mortimer a quantity of plate and jewellery, which he took the earliest opportunity of pledging the tickets of the property to a pawnbroker subsequently obtained from him —The prisoner was fully committed for trial upon three charges; and, on his being taken to the cell, by Mitchell, the gaoler, he was saluted by a number of persons with "Now, Kelly, you're caught at last; good bye, we shall see you no more for at least ten years."

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

SUICIDE OF COLONEL GURWOOD

An Inquest was held before F H. Gell, Esq., Coroner for East Sussex, on Monday morning, at 120, King's-road, Brighton, to inquire into the circumstances attending the death of Colonel John Gurwood, who had terminated his existence on the previous Saturday, by cutting his throat with a razor. The unfortunate deceased was a Colonel on the unattached list. He was at the battle of Waterloo on the staff of the Duke of Wellington; he likewise filled the post of Private Secretary to the Duke, and besides Deputy Constable of the Tower of London. Of late years he had been engaged in editing the "Despatches of the Duke of Wellington," and it was to the arrangement of these latter documents, and their literal labours, that his death was attributed. The following witnesses were examined at the inquest:—

Sarah, the wife of George Collins, of 120, King's-road, lodging-house-keeper deposed that last Tuesday morning Colonel and Mrs. Gurwood and their three daughters came there to reside. They brought no servants, and witness waited upon them. On Saturday last she went into the drawing-room at 10 o'clock, and then she went up to bring down the luncheon, when she saw Mrs. Gurwood dressed, as if she were going out for a walk. At a quarter past two o'clock a boy brought the newspaper, which witness took into the drawing-room, and she stirred the fire, and was going down stairs, when she glanced into the dressing-room, where the Colonel and Mrs Gurwood had slept the night before, in consequence of the violence of the wind, and thought she saw the Colonel's legs lying on the floor She did not take much notice, however, as she understood the Colonel was to fill she then resumed her work down-stairs, and afterwards mentioned what she had seen to her daughter. It then occurred to her that she might have been mistaken, as on second thoughts she considered it very strange that a gentleman should be stre ched along the floor. She accordingly went up, and coughed at the dressing-room door. No notice being taken, she went in and stirred the fire. She then coughed again, and finding that the Colonel did not speak, she pulled the door of the dressing-room open, and then saw him on the floor in a pool of blood, acting, as she supposed, from his having broken a blood-vessel. She had previously arranged with her husband that if everything was not right she was to ring, and she now rang the bell accordingly, and her husband came up. They both, after a few seconds of whether or not they should go in, and which was that her husband ran out for Mr E J. Turner, a surgeon, residing in King's-road, who came in about five minutes afterwards

Mr. E J Turner, surgeon, deposed that he was called on about three o'clock on Saturday afternoon by the husband of the last witness, who said that a gentleman was at his house very ill., he believed dying. Witness went immediately to the house, and was shown into the bedroom of a gentleman, who he was informed was Colonel Gurwood The Colonel was lying on the floor in a pool of blood. On lifting him up, witness found a razor grasped in his right hand, and a wound on the left side of the throat, four inches long, and from six inch to an inch and a half deep. In his opinion, this wound caused death, and he had no doubt that the death was instantaneous

Mr. Sir Henry Webster, a Lieutenant Colonel in the army, residing at 44, Brunswick-square, Brighton, deposed that he had known Colonel Gurwood for thirty years. About a month since the witness heard that he was unwell He accordingly visited him, and found him out of doors, and recommended him to come to Brighton for a change. Witness heard from Colonel Gurwood's medical attendant that he was in a weak low way; and, with the sanction of that gentleman, suggested that the Colonel and his family should take lodgings, and stay with him as long as he pleased. He came down accordingly, and remained with witness a few days. Witness and his family endeavoured to divert the Colonel's mind as much as possible by lively conversation, and getting him to walk as much as they could. After a few days, Mrs. Gurwood and his three daughters came down, and they took a lodging in the King s-road.

Coroner: Did you form an opinion as to the state of his mind?—Witness: From his conversation upon politics, as well as on general subjects, I found that he was in a very weak and desponding way.

Can you assign any cause for it?—I have no doubt it was all caused by the relaxation of the nerves, in consequence of his great work, the "Despatches of the Duke of Wellington," having been concluded. As long ago as a month I had seen a change in him.

Dr. George Hall, of the Old Steyne, Brighton, said he was called in some time since to attend Colonel Gurwood, and prescribed for him, after which he rallied, and got a little better. But lately he had fallen into a very desponding mood, indeed, and witness treated him accordingly, and had great hopes that he would get better. His despondency, however, returned, and he believed that such despondency was sufficient to cause temporary insanity in any one

This being all the evidence, the Coroner summed up, and the jury returned a verdict "That the deceased destroyed himself while in a temporary state of insanity."

SUICIDE AND ATTEMPTED MURDERS THROUGH DESTITUTION.

On Tuesday afternoon, Mr Wakley, M P, held an inquest at the Ben Jonson, Great Wilde-street, Drury-lane, upon the body of John Grainger, a blacksmith aged 27, who committed suicide, and attempted to kill his wife and brother, under the following distressing circumstances.

The Jury viewed the body of deceased, which lay at No. 9, Lincoln-court, in a room wretched in the extreme, and completely destitute of furniture.

Ann Grainger, the wife of deceased, is a young woman. She stated: The deceased, herself, and his brother, lived together Her husband was out of work, and all they had to live upon was what his brother earned, which did not exceed 18s a week. On the Saturday preceding his death they lay in bed all day, as they had nothing to eat During that week he attempted thrice to cut her throat and his brother's while asleep. His brother leaped into the street out of the window to save his life. He hanged them unawares, and hung himself. Last Christmas Eve he got a quarter day's work, for which he was paid two shillings. When he returned home he exclaimed, "All I have are two shillings, and I have not had a farthing. They will not trust me." What will become of you?" She endeavoured to comfort him, but in vain. About nine o'clock at night he took his brother with him to purchase, as he said, two ounces of salts, but would not tell his brother go into the druggist's shop with him. He returned home in three minutes, and getting two glasses he diluted the half of one package in each cup. He then said to witness, "I am going to take some salts. I have got an ounce for you, and an ounce for myself. It will do you good." He drank off his cup, and, fastening the door, seized her, threw her on the bed, holding in his hand an open razor, and exclaimed, "I am not going to leave you here after I die." She implored of him to spare her life, and called for help, when he said, "If you cry out, I will dash your brains out" Witness at length released herself from his grasp, and succeeded in opening the door, and procuring assistance. He however pulled her back, and kissed her, after which he made an effort to snatch the remainder of the poison from the landlady, but she threw it into the fire. A doctor was sent for, but he was a corpse before his arrival. They were in the deepest poverty, for the last article she pawned was her apron, for sixpence, and she had to borrow the dress in which she then appeared. The poor creature, during her evidence, was in a paroxysm of grief.

Coroner: Why did you not apply for relief to the parish? The law will not allow people to starve.

Bayley, the assisting officer, said, that if her husband had no work, or even half employment, the parish would have relieved him.

Richard Grainger, brother of deceased, was next examined, and confirmed the last witness's evidence. Although he was only twenty years of age, so stinted in his growth and so poverty-stricken was he, that he appeared to be not more than twelve years of age

Deceased's landlady gave him, his wife, and brother, a most excellent character

Verdict, "Insanity."

The Coroner and Jury raised a subscription for the relief of the wretched woman and her brother-in-law.

THE CONVICTS UNDER SENTENCE OF DEATH.

The execution of the two criminals, Martha Browning and Samuel Quennell, who were convicted of murder at the last session of the Central Criminal Court, will take place on Monday next; the former at the usual spot in front of the gaol of Newgate, and the latter on the top of the Surrey county gaol, at Horsemonger-lane. Within the last few days a petition has been sent to the Home Secretary by the relations of Quennell, praying for a commutation of the sentence on account of the state of his mind; but as there did not appear to be any evidence of facts to warrant the conclusion that his mind was affected an answer was returned from the Home-office, stating that the case was of such a character as would not warrant any interference on the part of the authorities with the sentence of the law, and that it must, therefore, take its course. An application was also made on behalf of the other culprit, Martha Browning, by some members of the Society of Friends and others who are averse to the principle of capital punishment, praying such a similar commutation of her sentence; but as the wretched young woman has unburdened her mind by making the confession which appeared last week, she has been much more resigned and composed; and in the course of some conversation she had on Sunday last with the Rev. Mr Cotton, she expressed an opinion that the spectacle of her being publicly executed would be calculated to have the effect of preventing others from committing a similar crime

With regard to the duties of the miserable criminals, it appears that since his removal to Horsemonger-lane Gaol, he has continued to exhibit the same sullen demeanour that he evinced at the trial.

Owing to the alteration in the law, and the great diminution in the number of capital punishments, there has been for a good many years only one official executioner, who performs the office in all parts of the country. The authorities, considering that the spectacle might not be desirable for the two executions that are to take place together at the Old Bailey, made the alteration in the sentence to the effect that Quennell should be executed within the county where his offence was committed; and as it will be impossible for the executioner to be present at Newgate when he will have to remain until nine o'clock, which is the usual time for the infliction of the capital punishment at Horsemonger-lane, the hour for the execution of Quennell has been altered to ten o'clock.

SUDDEN DEATH OF THE EARL OF PORTARLINGTON.—On Wednesday, an inquiry took place before William Carter, Esq., the deputy-coroner of the residence of the Earl of Portarlington, in the Kennington-road, as to the death of that nobleman. The Jury having viewed the body, which was lying in an adjoining room, Mr Carr was examined. He said he was a surgeon, and had resided with her and her father for the last two years: his age was about sixty-three. On Sunday last he had been writing in the drawing-room, and observing a boy selling oranges in the street, he made a remark that he thought it ought not to be permitted. He appeared then in excellent health, and afterwards went to his bed-room to wash his hands. While there she thought she heard a gurgling noise, and proceeded her to go to the door, and he appeared to have fallen down as if in a fit. Mr. Nairne, the surgeon, was sent for, and came immediately, but he said he was quite dead.—Mr. Charles Nairne, of 8, Chiles-terrace, Kennington, surgeon, deposed that about two o'clock on Sunday a very urgent message was sent to him to go to the deceased's residence, as he was in a fit He did so immediately, but on his arrival found him dead. There was an external mark of violence, and nothing to indicate the cause of death. Witness had since made a post mortem examination in the presence of Mr. Wildbore and Mr. Parrett. On opening the chest he found the large vessels of the heart greatly ossified (hardened), and nothing to that quite healthy. There was congestion of the vessels of the brain, and considerable effusion of serum in the ventricles The state of the heart and brain was quite sufficient to cause very sudden death. There was no mark of violence, nothing to indicate anything.—The Jury returned immediately a verdict of "Died from natural causes."

THE YARMOUTH MURDER.—Yarham, the man who was apprehended in Gloucestershire, on suspicion of being the actual murderer, underwent a second private examination before the magistrates at Yarmouth on Tuesday, and was again remanded for a week. Yarham, it will be remembered, was arrested in consequence of the Crown at the trial and his apprehension raised a legal question whether a witness for the Crown could be afterwards prosecuted. According to the confession alleged by Mrs. Dick to have been made to her husband, it appears that about two o'clock on Sunday a very urgent message was sent to him to go to the deceased's residence, as he was in a fit He did so immediately, but on his arrival found him dead. There was an external mark of violence, and nothing to indicate the cause of death. Witness had since made a post mortem examination in the presence of Mr. Wildbore and Mr. Parrett. On opening the chest he found the large vessels of the heart greatly ossified (hardened), and nothing to that quite healthy. There was congestion of the vessels of the brain, and considerable effusion of serum in the ventricles The state of the heart and brain was quite sufficient to cause very sudden death. There was no mark of violence, nothing to indicate anything.—The Jury returned immediately a verdict of "Died from natural causes."

THE YARMOUTH MURDER.—Yarhan, the man who was apprehended in Gloucestershire, on suspicion of being the actual murderer, underwent a second private examination before the magistrates at Yarmouth on Tuesday, and was again remanded for a week. Yarham, it will be remembered, was arrested in consequence of the Crown at the trial and his apprehension raised a legal question whether a witness for the Crown could be afterwards prosecuted. According to the confession alleged by Mrs. Dick to have been made to her husband, it appears that the man who committed the murder, the Attorney-General gave his opinion that Yarham might, under such circumstances, be tried for the crime. The chief witness against Yarham is the aforesaid Mrs. Dick, who was examined on the first day of the present month at Yarmouth, and stated that Mrs. Dick has invented or exaggerated. Yarham left his address at his father's when he went into Gloucestershire, and there was no difficulty in finding him.

THE LATE ACCIDENT ON THE NORFOLK RAILWAY.—On Friday (last week) Mr. R E Clarke, Coroner for the borough of Thetford, had an inquest at that place, relative to the accident on the Norfolk railway, on the 22nd ult., by which several persons were killed or injured. Only a few of the witnesses were examined, but there was no distinct proof as to the cause of the train going off the rails. As the guards with the train were too much injured to attend, the inquest was adjourned to Monday next. Some of the slightly injured One of his legs was torn from it, and broken in three places. The poor fellow died in great agony, begging the persons around him to deprive him of life in order to terminate his sufferings The inquest was resumed on Tuesday, at Thetford. The evidence did not add anything material; but two witnesses who saw the train immediately before the accident said it was travelling at a much faster rate than usual. John Arrett, a farmer's bailiff, said he remarked that the fire was flying about in great quantities, and immediately after the engine jumped off the rail. William Coldman, the guard, maintained that the speed was not much, if any, faster than usual, and said it did not exceed forty miles an hour. The inquiry was again adjourned.

SERIOUS FIRE IN THE WALWORTH-ROAD.—On Wednesday night, shortly after ten o'clock, a fire, attended with a very serious conflagration, broke out in the premises belonging to Mr Hacker, a hat merchant, carrying on business at 80, Crosby-row, Walworth-road, within a short distance of Camberwell. At nough the flames secured themselves in such a manner as to confine the flames to the premises in which they began, and whilst they were working, the conflagration extended first to the right and then to the left, setting the premises on either side in flames. By Inspector twelve o'clock, however, they happily succeeded in getting the mastery over the flames. At that period the whole of Mr. Hacker's stock in trade was consumed; the valuable stock of Mr. Picking, parasol manufacturer, was reduced to ashes; his adjoining premises and stock of linendrapery, severely damaged; and the building and contents of Mr. Gunning's grocer, are very extensively injured by fire and water. The total damage is very considerable

THE GUN TRADE, BIRMINGHAM.—Not long since an order for 40,000 stand of arms was received in Birmingham, from Government, in consequence of which, and other orders of a similar character, the gun trade there is in a state of high prosperity. Most of the guns ordered, it is said, are to be put in store at the barracks at Weedon.

EASY CHAIRS

The immense popularity and cheapness of the easy chair [illegible] perhaps than the variety of its models In every respectable counting-house, attorney's office, or, in fact, any place of sedentary employment among the middling classes, there the easy chair expands its swelling lap, full of the balance-sheet. We dozed last night in the mere close [illegible] partment, the clerk's office; but pursue the valuable client into the confidential room of the man of business; there, gathered in snug divan round a limited table, each with the well-lined open portfolio spread [illegible] he chairs wherein the firm are wont to concert their [illegible] dowsy pink of the blotting page; not the square-bevel solidity of the [illegible] ckstands, garnished with their quivers full of the grey or green of portly back of the ledger itself, convey such a realisation of golden dreams as the sleek contour of these well-stuffed comforters. Look at the contrast [illegible] by an old-fashioned set of legal chambers [illegible] ere the quaint, straight, black-leather arm-chair, with its oval back board and row of cork-looking nails and the grease, ink, and dust of times or four pranc ess beginning to [illegible] ccident for bare hard rolls of Chancery suits. Piles of parchments, [illegible] cobwebs without, but fair black and white within, lumber its seat; while the yard or two of red tape dangling across the arm, shows the stiff creases of a knot which the Court of Chancery may have tied a century back. Peep into any of the "chambers," "rooms," or "apartments," where Young England sits, pondering the sublime idea of a nation redeemed by its youth; will you not find him in shooting-jacket, and [illegible] novel, cigar, and—easy chair? There is no place, perhaps, where ingenuity perplexes itself so luxuriantly in versatility of device in these chairs as at our Universities. Whether your friend be a fast or reading man he knows the value of an easy chair; the morning after a hunting supper party, or the evening after a hard day's Aristotle. If he be out when you call, there it stands with the anti-Macassar on its crown; the empty shooting-jacket reclining on its shoulder; the extended cigar-case on its seat; as good a sonsoire altogether of his presence as any but a dun could desire.—The Union Magazine, No. 1.

THE NEW YEAR.

It is a very happy thing for us when the chimes of the new year have called us up into the steeple before many of them have been rung in. It is always a delightful moment when we may shape our future counters by our past. When, at all events, we are enabled to start with some capital, an occasional turn by temptation or folly will not break us. We have still something to fall back on; the stock-in-trade is not exhausted. "All my accounts are closed," reckoned to the idle business of my little garden, and to the reading of idle books, where the mind is seldom called on." This was the condition of Chesterfield—old, angry, and deaf—in his parsonage at Blackheath He had gold, indeed, at his call, but it was of a base currency, and without the legal superscription. Bacon had not one good coin in his pocket when he made the desolate and desperate appeal to James I., Si is dormis, parcens. How many happier the sensation given by Henry Sidney to his son! "Bless you, my sweet boy! Pergo, pergo, my Robin, in the filial fear of God, and in the meanest imagination of your duty, and earnestly labouring to be a noble and an inspired man, after the Grecian story of piety and affection thus transferred to a different country, and fulfilled in a different object; to see the time that is gone continually brought back to cherish, to comfort, and to support the time that is come; to feel the wasted virtue of our manhood invigorated by the life-giving current of our youth, the decrepitude and exhaustion of the parent refreshed by the glowing season of the child. Thus, in a higher sense than even the poetic eye foresaw in its rapture and prophecy, may the child become the father of the man.—Fraser's Magazine.

THE ARTIST.

It would be as superfluous, as it is impossible, to point out how every period and condition of human life furnishes its measure to the enjoyment of the artist: how manhood, and especially old age—the healthy and the invalid—the dreams and the waking world—the poor and the rich—the citizen and the countryman—whether men of genius and of power, or humbler in their habits and desires, how each and all of these supply some materials to the imagination. It should be observed, however, that to the eye of the artist, what seem to others a barren heath in human character, presents an idiosyncrasy of its own, that marks it out from the world around it. It is here which sees what is hidden to the vulgar eye, and invents, under unpromising forms, to discover the immortal. Besides this, what is likewise distinctive of art, it can extract from the disagreeable, if not the revolting, one or more elements of interest. In short, nothing is there in life that may not, with consummate skill, be made attractive in art. Wherever there is a human heart, there is something to love, more, perhaps, to pity, and compassionate, if also (would that it were otherwise!) something to loath and condemn.—Lowe's Edinburgh Magazine, No. 1.

THE UNITED STATES

This is the great fact about America. Her present population live and breathe in an age of labour. To found cities, to establish communes on wide foreign countries, to plant the arts of ages, and the light for the future, is the noble abomination of desolation," is the mission of these millions. To sow the pastures of the buffalo and the wild horse with the seeds of human food—to spread over the rude soil the sun like ones that are the fierce and fruitful glandes, catamount—to plant broad human hearths where the bear and the wild boar had their lairs of old—to launch forests forth, shup-shaped, upon every sea—these are their ambitious projects, and their human purposes for hundreds of millions: A thousand years from now, how proud their descendants will be of having had such an ancestry!—Bolman's Magazine.

CLIMATE OF NEW ZEALAND.—(BY A RESIDENT.)

We believe all New Zealand is healthy, but our climate is possibly altogether the finest and most agreeable. We have rain enough for agriculture, and sunshine enough for enjoyment. As far as our experience goes, the winter weather is far more delightful than summer. We have had, since May last, with perfect calm, warm sun, and literally cloudless sky. The disagreeables are the coldness of night after the warmth of day, and the occasional violence of the seasons in the more unsettled parts of the settlement. We have heard Mr. Fidler, the last to be a hard master, declare that for a whole year his men were prevented from working by bad weather only twenty-three days.—Colonial Magazine.

COLMAN THE YOUNGER.

Colman, when a boy at school, having, together with one of his class-fellows, been guilty of the unusual crime of getting through a certain portion of his duties in a more than ordinary creditable manner, the two received, as a reward, permission, if they chose it, to omit writing their usual evening's exercise. On the master going out, Colman said to his comrade, "Well, what shall we do?" The other replied, "Oh, I shall write my exercise, what's your?" "On the contrary," replied Master George, "I shall exercise my right."—Sharpe's London Magazine.

POPULAR ENGLISH PASTIMES

As the principle of woodcraft is proved by the naturalist to be free from all cruelty, so the spirit of our national sports now, whatever it might have been, is without approach to coarseness or cause for reproach Show me in the turf pursued as a recreation, aught of which the great human need be ashamed? Is not hunting a sport befitting the gentle? and is not yachting a pastime of which an English noble may well be proud? How soon will many of our games of cricket! and is there one among us, even to the uttermost of those grandmammas already apostrophized, who would not rather see the only boast of her of their house and name snatch in a gale of wind from Cowes to Westminster to Putney, with less than the substance of a pill-box between him and eternity, than a smooth proper prig, with his hair always combed down on his forehead, hands always clean, and without spot or blemish, as the white thread stockings We had fain see the cause of manliness and natural taste flourish and increase; and we are the pledged advocates of our popular pastimes, because we believe they work in the end, as we have already written—anywhere, weal out from them all that is base or mean; let them be frank and gentle, and our word for it they find a friend in every English heart, wether it beat beneath a sober coat or a plaid or plush. Shame no [illegible] of honest character; let their properties be difficulty, distress, danger; but not the struggle on which one looks, while another suffers. The spirit of English sporting mostly redeems that of which generally we have the less, than any nation, should that [illegible] obtained among mankind. It is for the days in which we live to perfect this glorious work. Will they not earn such immortality?—New sporting Magazine.

GEORGE THE FOURTH.

If the testimony were wanted of King George the Fourth's regard for letters, his action in the Scott affair would be conclusive world [illegible] Baillie. There is, however, a little picture, not so well known as it deserves to be, which exhibits him in a most pleasing light. The picture we refer to is contained in a letter written in 1825, and addressed by the King Bath to the late Sir William Knighton:—

"Dear Friend,—A little circumstance of popular interest has come to my knowledge into the distresses of poor old O Keefe, now ninety years of age, and stone-blind, whom I knew a little of formerly, having occasionally met him at parties of my juvenile recreation and hilarity, to which he then contributed a little. Sorely pressed as it is for the present moment, and the dividend [illegible] comfort as he is represented to be, then I do conceive that there can be no [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

TRIESTE.—THE HARBOUR.

TRIESTE.

Trieste, the chief town of the Austrian Littora, or coast-land of Illyria, and the most flourishing town in the Austrian dominions, has lately been brought into notice by Lieut. Waghorn having achieved his more rapid conveyance of the Overland Mail by this route. It may, therefore, be reasonably inferred that when the arrangements are completed, Trieste will become a place of much greater importance and interest to the English than hitherto.

The town, once a Roman colony (Tergeste), lies at the north-eastern extremity of the Adriatic, at the bottom of a gulf named after the town. It owes its prosperity to the Emperor Charles VI., who, in 1719, made it a free port, and to Maria Theresa, who fostered it with her patronage. Its population, at that time, was about 4000: it has gradually increased to upwards of 60,000 (76,561 in 1839); it has completely supplanted Venice, and it may be said to engross the entire trade of the Adriatic. It is, indeed, to Southern, what Hamburg is to Northern Germany, and is daily advancing in trade, wealth, and population.

The harbour is formed by a pier (Molo) of solid masonry, 60 feet wide, stretching from the extreinity of the town, along a reef of half-sunken rocks, about 2200 feet into the sea. At its extremity is a lighthouse. There is not space within it for more than 40 or 50 vessels of large tonnage. The Mole is a pleasant walk.

The town is divided into old and new; the former occupies the slope of a hill, which is surmounted by the Castle, near which is the Cathedral of San Giusto, in the round or Byzantine style; the interior richly dight with mosaics. Winkleinann, the antiquary, is buried in the adjoining cemetery; he was murdered in an inn here, by an Italian, whose cupidity he had excited by showing the gold medal he had received at Vienna as a reward for his learned researches; the assassin, having failed in an attempt to strangle him, despatched him with a knife.

Between the old and new town runs the Corso, the principal thoroughfare, including the best shops and cafés, and communicating with two squares, Piazza Grande and Börsenplatz.

The new town consists of broad streets, of handsome white houses, and occupies the level space near the harbour. A broad canal runs up from the water through a quarter of the town, and by means of it vessels of large burthen can be unloaded almost at the merchant's doors. At its extremity stands the modern church of St. Antony, built in 1830. The Exchange, the finest building in Trieste, stands in the centre of the Börsenplatz. There are two theatres. Outside of the town, on the seashore, is the New Lazaretto, one of the largest and best arranged in Europe. It has a separate harbour, in which 60 vessels can perform quarantine at once: it contains lodgings for 200 persons, and is surrounded by a wall 24 feet high.

"The inhabitants of Trieste are a motley race, derived from all parts of the world; some of the richest merchants are Greeks, Jews, and English. Among the town's-people may be found Germans, Americans, Italians, Greeks, Jews, Armenians, &c.; the sailors and fishermen near the quays are chiefly Dalmatians. The original inhabitants are Italians; the country-people who frequent the markets Sclavonians of Illyrian origin. The Italian is the prevailing language, and is used in the courts of justice; but all the other tongues are spoken: in the public offices German is used; by the peasantry a Sclavonian dialect. The streets of Trieste were formerly remarkable for the variety and strangeness of the costume which they presented, but these are fast disappearing, owing to the quantity of British goods poured into the free port. The Greeks are very numerous here, and some of the wealthiest merchants are of this nation. The houses of Carciotti, whose sole property, when he first landed at Trieste, consisted of a bag of cotton, which he had improved into a princely fortune before he died, leaving a palace extending to three streets—those of Griot and of Chiozza, are the most splendid private buildings in the town. The Greeks have two fine churches here, in which their service is performed with great splendour. The Greek Church at the end of the great canal is the handsomest religious edifice here. The English settled here are numerous enough to have a chapel for their own church service, in the Contrade del Fontanone, which is attended by about 140 persons, including sailors. Service begins at ten. The British Consul-General to the Austrian States resides here."—Murray's Hand-Book of Northern Germany.

Consuls of almost every nation in Europe reside at Trieste: it has 19 banks and insurance companies, 1000 merchants, and 700 brokers. Its commerce was much increased by the commercial treaty concluded with Greece in 1835, and by the new institution of the Austrian Lloyd's, which is supported by the Government. The number of ships engaged in the commerce of Trieste is great: of large merchantmen there are about 1500 arrivals, of all nations, and the number of arrivals of coasting vessels is not less than 8000. Several steamers ply between Trieste and Venice, and the Austrian Lloyd's has a regular communication by steamers with Greece and Egypt. The harbour is defended by a strong battery on the New Mole.

Trieste is a seaport for a very large tract of country, the south of Germany, the Illyrian and part of the Sclavonian provinces; in short, for the whole of the Austrian territories from the Tyrol to Transylvania. Among the exports are the productions of the mines of Idria, those of Hungary, linens, tobacco, and woollens from different parts of the Austrian dominions, and printed calicoes from Switzerland. The imports are cotton from Egypt; hides, raisins, silks, rice, and oil from the Levant; wheat from Odessa; and all kinds of tropical and colonial produce from the West Indies and Brazil. Ship-building is carried on to a great extent, and the ship-builders of Trieste are so much esteemed for their skill, that designs for vessels of various kinds are sent as models to many foreign parts.

After the treaty of Vienna in 1809, Trieste, with its territory, was annexed by Napoleon to Illyria. In 1814, it returned to the dominion of Austria; and in 1818 received the title of "Città Fedelissima."

TRIESTE.—THE ENVIRONS.

WILL OF THE LATE MRS JAFFRAY. The late Mrs. Jaffray, the widow of Captain Jaffray, late of the East India Company's service, has left personal property amounting to nearly £60,000. She made her will about a fortnight before her death, bequeathing her property as follows:—To Mr. M'Cabe, physician, Hastings, £2000; to her man servant, £2000; to two female servants, £1000 each; to her god-daughter, Blanche, the daughter of the late Mr J. Cox, £2000; to his widow, £500; and his son, £500; to Mrs. R. M. Orme, £500; and to the testatrix's nephew, Henry N. Nugent, of the Hon. East India Company's Medical service, £200. The residue, between £40,000 and £50,000, she leaves to her executors, Mr. Francis Smith, banker, and Mr Eli West Stubbs, cleanist, both of Hastings, for their own absolute use. The will is dated Nov. 11, 1845.

AWFUL INSTANCE OF SUDDEN DEATH.—On Monday evening, a party of the tradesmen of the village of Hendon, Middlesex, met at the Greyhound Inn, pursuant to annual custom, to partake of the hospitality of the landlord, on which occasion Mr. Charlesley, an independent inhabitant, presided; and having helped the company, he was about to take some refreshment himself, when he suddenly left the room, and in a few minutes he was a corpse. He has left a widow and six children to lament his loss. He was very jocular, and appeared to be in the best of heal h

DESTRUCTION OF THE PRINT WORKS AT WIGTON.—On Wednesday (last week), the extensive calico print-works at Wigton, belonging to the firm of Messrs. Halliley and Co., and which formed, in fact, the only description of manufacture carried on in the place, took fire, and in the course of a few hours were almost totally destroyed. The works were carried on in two or more separate buildings, the two principal being connected with wooden gangways. The total loss has not yet been ascertained, but the destruction has certainly been very great. The premises, machinery, and goods were insured in the Sun Fire Office. Almost all the printing machines, with their engraved copper rollers, which are very costly, have been destroyed, or rendered totally unfit for service. The fire first broke out in a machine-room in a western portion of the building, but its origin is as yet unknown. No one, it is stated, had been working in that room after dusk, but there is no reason whatever to suppose that the fire was other than accidental. These print-works were old established, and afforded employment to nearly 200 persons, many of whom have, of course, families dependent upon them for support; and some idea of the loss which the tradesmen of the town must suffer may be estimated from the fact that about £200 was weekly expended in wages. It is one of the greatest calamities that ever befel Wigton. The most melancholy part of the affair, perhaps, is the number of people dependent upon their daily labour for support, whom the accident must necessarily throw out of employment at this inclement season of the year.

TRIESTE.—THE HOTEL.

THE RIVER PLATE.

A Correspondent, on board H.M.S Gorgon, has favoured us with the annexed spirited Sketch of the English and French ships of war before the town of Colonia, situated on the north bank of the River Plate, and nearly opposite Buenos Ayres. The view shows the combined squadron, with the respective positions of the vessels after their capture of the town.

The latest accounts from the Plate come down to the 29th of October; when everything remained nearly in the same state as by previous advices. The Chargés d'Affaires of the United States and of Portugal at Buenos Ayres, had protested against the blockade.

The combined squadrons had, it appears, prohibited even neutral vessels of war from anchoring in the inner roads at Buenos Ayres. A Brazilian corvette having come to there, was ordered into the outer roads, but the Captain refused to do so, and immediately proceeded to Monte Video to apprise his Commander-in-Chief of the occurrence, which caused some little sensation there and at Rio.

The Message of President Oribe to the Legislative Chambers of the Oriental Republic has been received. The occasion of its delivery was the re-assembling of the Legal Chambers for the first time since their dispersion in 1838. The document is lengthy: it adverts in good set terms to "the scandalous intervention of the French agents" in the above year, and glances at the President's emigration to Buenos Ayres.

We pass over a great deal of intermediate matter, and come to the following remarks on the present state of affairs in the Oriental Republic:—

"The Government, as was natural, refused decidedly to obey the dictation of the English and French Ministers, and resolved to sustain, at all risks, the independence of the nation against any foreign power. The blockade of the port of Buceo has taken place in consequence, and will, no doubt, be followed by that of the other ports of the Republic; but, honourable senators and representatives, the Government repeats to you that it is resolved to defend the rights and independence of the country to the last extreme, not to yield one atom of what belongs to its dignity, and to maintain itself in spite of whatever consequences may arise to the State from its firm determination either to perish or assure its political existence.

"The Ministers of England and France announced a mission of peace, and are giving rise to a bloody and desolating war, with the independence of the Republic constantly in their mouths. They are blockading our ports for not humbling ourselves before their nod. They may give their own colouring to these acts in Europe, but here it is well known that the legal President has with him the whole nation; that he is only its mouthpiece; and that the obstructions offered to his measures are therefore attacks upon it. They profess great solicitude for the interests of humanity and commerce, whilst they are notoriously sacrificing both now, and preparing for them a future still more fearful.

"An apprehension is affected less the Argentine Government, which acts only in virtue of a natural alliance, and in accordance with the law of nations, should have some views upon the independence of the Oriental State, and this, in spite of the solemn denials of that Government, and in spite of its known determination to abstain from any interference in its internal administration; and yet, while affecting this, the English and French Cabinets, their diplomatic envoys, their naval commanders, without any cause, or right, or direct interest, think themselves entitled to interfere in every thing—to exact, to blockade, to attack the independence of both Republics—and the Admirals go so far as to say, they will take the rebels under their protection, and defend them by all the means in their power.

"This, hon. gentlemen, proves that they wish to exercise a despotic dominion over these countries, which it is our duty to resist at every hazard, whatever be the mask under which it is hidden. The Government is resolved to do so, and doubts not that, supported by your patriotic decision, it will succeed in so glorious an object.

NAPOLEON'S MAMELUKE.

THE ATTEMPT TO FORM A WHIG MINISTRY.—Mr. Macaulay has written a letter to a friend in Edinburgh, from which it clearly appears that the cause of the non-formation of a Whig Ministry was the determination of Lord Grey not to belong to a Cabinet of which Lord Palmerston formed a part. Mr. Macaulay, in his letter, says "All our plans were frustrated by Lord Grey. I hope that the public interests will not suffer. Sir Robert Peel must now undertake the settlement of the question. It is certain that he can settle it. It is by no means certain that we could have done so. For we shall to a man support him; and a large proportion of those who are not in office would have refused to support us. On my own share in these transactions I reflect with unmixed satisfaction. From the first, I told Lord John that I stipulated for one thing only—total and immediate repeal of the Corn-laws; that my objections to gradual abolition were insurmountable; and that if he declared for total and immediate repeal, I would be, as to all other matters, absolutely in his hands; that I would take any office or no office, just as suited him best; and that he never should be disturbed by any personal pretensions or jealousies on my part. If everybody else had acted thus, there would now have been a Liberal Ministry. However, as I said, perhaps it is best as it is. I do not think that, if we had formed a Government, we should have entertained the question of paying the Roman Catholic priests of Ireland. I cannot answer for others; but I should have thought it positive insanity to stir the matter."

CLERKS' CHRISTMAS FUND.—On the day before Christmas-day, Mr. Kirby, who is, we understand, one of the principal clerks in Messrs. Jones Loyd and Co.'s banking house, received a note signed S. J. Loyd, enclosing a draft. The following is a copy of the note:—"Dear Mr. Kirby—The enclosed draft for £1000 I request you will place to the credit of the Clerks' Christmas Fund. At the close of the first year since my accession to the head of this concern, I am desirous of offering to those through whose assistance I have been enabled to bring it to a satisfactory conclusion, some substantial proof of my sense of those services and of the interest which I feel in all that concerns their comfort and happiness. The year now closing has been marked by some circumstances of an accidental and temporary character, which have tended to throw an unusual degree of labour and trouble on the clerical department of the office. Of the readiness with which this difficulty has been met and overcome, I am very sensible, and for this, as well as for the uniform zeal and integrity with which the general duties of the office are discharged, I beg that the clerks will accept my grateful acknowledgments, and that you and they will believe me to be the faithful friend of you all. —S. J. LOYD. Lothbury, Dec. 24, 1845." Comment is unnecessary upon such a communication.

ROUSTAN, THE MAMELUKE OF NAPOLEON.

Another name which belongs to history has just departed; it does not owe so much, perhaps, to Clio, as to the muse, if there be one who presides over the recording of events by painting; in this respect, the name of Roustan, the Mameluke, is eminently historical. Who has not seen him amid that group of brilliant warriors of the staff always gathered round the Emperor in all the paintings of his battles—the same at Eylau as at Austerlitz. His turban and fur-trimmed robe were too tempting to an artist, puzzled by uniformity of costume, to be omitted; and whether in the battle field or not, he is always found in the painting of it: he was picturesque, and thus the pencil has handed him down to posterity. But writers have neglected him; and, with an Eastern indifference to literature, he has done nothing for himself. The hair-dresser of Maria Antoinette wrote memoires of his life and times; we have souvenirs innumerable by valets, and cooks, and footmen—by all the little men who have lived dependent on the great ones. We have searched through a whole library of such works, but Roustan has disdained to tell us what Napoleon seemed to him.

For once the mountain has escaped measurement by the scale of inches; perhaps familiarity had made it nothing remarkable, and he thought of Napoleon merely as Roustan's master, not the world's! He served him faithfully, and deemed that enough; the world will easily pardon the bad book the less which it might have had but for his forbearing to gossip of the much he must have seen, and the little he could comprehend. But, from the same cause, little or nothing is known of his own personal history, save that, for many years, he was, in good fortune and bad, a favoured attendant of the Emperor, till his fall and exile. Even the French journals, for whom the associations of his name might have some interest, record his death in two brief lines. The munificence of his master had placed him in easy circumstances, and he had for years retired on an income of more than £200 a year, derived from the sale of gifts and presents; he had long resided at Dourdan (Seine-et-Oise), where he died on Sunday, the 7th ult. Our authorities do not say at what age, but he must have been advanced in years.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

We are, at the commencement of a New Year, again enabled to make one of those joyous announcements to our readers, which are ever sources of pleasure to ourselves in the proportion in which their fulfilment tends to the profit and enjoyment of the Public, "for whom we live"—or, at least, of that portion of it with whom we are in weekly and friendly communion.

The perfect honesty of principle and purpose with which this Journal has continued its career, has maintained for it the undeviating confidence of those who placed reliance upon its early promise, and have had no reason to regret their trust. This is our boast; and it will be seen that we uphold our right to it.

It was in this spirit that—destined little to profit, but much to please—we prepared those magnificent commemorations of our early patronage, and afterwards confirmed prosperity—the GRAND VIEW OF LONDON—and superb PANORAMA OF THE THAMES—presented, at fitting intervals, to our readers.

It is in the same spirit that now—with foot firm in the stirrup—gratitude inspiring, and confidence insured—we announce our intention to present our readers with Noble Pictures, in appropriate form, and with the best genius and illustration that modern art can afford, and without a thought of expense,

MAGNIFICENT PICTURES OF THE PRINCIPAL CITIES OF EUROPE.

It is not more our determination that their production shall surprise all who receive them, than that the faithful Illustrations themselves shall become so many records and monuments of what the good-will and hearty friendship of the public enabled the first Illustrated Newspaper in the Nineteenth Century to achieve. Edinburgh and Dublin put forth their sister claims with London; and we may well aspire to reflect on a grand scale, the Chiefest Cities of Europe, when not Europe, nor any territory short of the whole known world, is able to affix a limit to our circulation.

The minute details of our plan, in presenting these Magnificent Pictures to our Subscribers, will be immediately placed at their disposal. For the present, we are glad to believe that there is not one of them who will not feel confidence and pleasure in its plain ANNOUNCEMENT.

The Number of our Journal, with the Presentation Print, price 6d. No extra charge will be made. The first Print, a VIEW OF THE CITY OF DUBLIN, will be presented early in the present year.

By the old measure, the extreme length is taken from a line dropped from the fore side of the stem, and measured along the rabbet of the keel, (not the bottom of it), to the after side of the stern-post: any rake in the stern-post, be it much or little, is not measured, and the breadth is taken in the broadest part (exclusive of mouldings. Thus, a vessel measuring* 35*ft.* 11*in.* between the perpendiculars, (i.e. measured as above), by 11*ft.* 11*in.* beam, would be 24 58-94 tons. The same vessel, if measured by the new method, would measure less, or more, according to the form of her; for if rated by the new measure, it is what she will actually carry, —which is ascertained by a series of admeasurements externally.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 3, 1846.

In this season of acknowledgments, we cannot suffer the Old Year to depart, without recording an open and direct expression of our gratitude for the extensive and still increasing support we have received throughout that period. Our publication has called a new class of newspaper correspondents into existence—the contributors of sketches of interesting places and events. For the many freewill offerings of this kind we feel most grateful. These sketches, made at the moment and on the spot, enable us to "illustrate" the "news" of the day with extreme fidelity; and we beg those who have so frequently furnished us with them, to accept our thanks for them; we need not add that a continuation of their efforts, should occasion suggest them, will be most welcome. We first address those contributors who are resident within the kingdom; but we are still more bound to acknowledge the voluntary offerings which have been forwarded to us from the most distant parts of the world. From "China to Peru," there is not a climate or region of the earth, from which we have not received these useful and cheering contributions. Their utility is obvious: they are cheering, inasmuch as they prove the widely-spread interest excited by our enterprise for in the great majority of cases, the contributors were wholly unknown to us. We have thus received sketches of strange scenery, of strange people and costumes, of events on flood and field, and of incidents of battle and wreck, which, without the aid of the pencil and sketch-book employed on the spot, would have left no graven record after them. Often have these sketches exhibited great artistic excellence; but it may encourage some, timid, perhaps, from the consciousness of not having reached a certain point of ability, that perfect finish we do not require; the faithful sketch, not the elaborated picture, is what is wanted. Fidelity, exactness, and authenticity of detail, are the great essentials. It is always pleasing to receive these favours, and those to whom we owe them may rest assured they are both appreciated and remembered.

THE foreign intelligence is interesting—at least to politicians, though for the mass of mankind it presents no striking incident. The Chambers of the French and Spain have been opened by the respective Monarchs with all due ceremonial; and about the same time we are apprised of the opening of the Legislature of the Sandwich Islands, in the account of which solemnity, the forms and language of European Courts being closely adhered to, there is a rich air of burlesque most appropriate to the season of pantomime. Ministers of the Interior and of Foreign Affairs, are there; all the dignitaries of our Royalties are reproduced in the bosom of the distant seas; the "gracious Speech from the Throne" is an exact copy of others nearer home; and is a credit to the state of civilization these distant regions have attained. If we may judge from its context, the interests of the community will not suffer in the hands of the successor of King Tamehama.

With much more cause, the Royal Addresses of our European neighbours are not so grandiloquent. The King of the French is delighted to record the capture or death of Abd-el-Kader—an event so earnestly desired, the state of things in Algeria becoming more and more embarrassing. The French do not seem to consider the war with the Arabs any war at all—since the King felicitates the Chambers on the preservation of "general peace." Certainly, the repose of Europe has not been disturbed; and it is pleasing to see the fact so dwelt on, as well as the good feeling existing between Louis Philippe and our own gracious Queen. Long may it continue! and we wish we could think it extended in the same degree to the mass of the people in both countries. In the preliminary and formal proceedings of the French Chamber, which are made a kind of trial of strength between the Ministry and the Opposition, M. Guizot has been successful, and the political campaign of the Session has commenced rather auspiciously.

The Spanish Cortes have also been formally called to the exercise of their annual functions; but, for some time to come, individual will and energy are likely to have much more influence on public affairs than constitutional forms. The casting out of the many vices with which the Spanish Government is infected, can only be done by the strong hand, and a strong hand seems to have been found to do it. The great want of the Spanish people for the next generation has been a leader, a man of head to take the command. Narvaez is such a man, though somewhat rough and coarse in manners; his determination is unquestionable, and the power to act was the thing wanted.

CHANGES IN THE MINISTRY.—Our announcement respecting Lord Ellenborough is completely confirmed His Lordship will return to office as First Lord of the Admiralty. The Duke of Buccleuch is to succeed the late Lord Wharncliffe, as President of the Council. Lord Haddington has accepted the Privy Seal, in the room of the Duke of Buccleuch. The Earl of St. Germans has succeeded Lord Lonsdale, as Postmaster-General.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE ROYAL BOUNTY TO THE POOR OF WINDSOR
Windsor, Thursday Evening.

Her Majesty's new year's gifts to the poor and needy families residing within the borough, were distributed this morning in the New Riding School, at the Royal Mews. In the centre of the Riding School was a table, between fifty and sixty feet in length, upon which were displayed the numerous joints of beef, weighing about fifteen cwt., ornamented with holly and evergreens. The blankets for distribution were ranged upon long tables along the north and south sides of the building, and either end were tables upon which were displayed half a ton of plum-pudding, and a ton weight of bread in four pound loaves.

Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert (who were present to be spectators of the gratifying scene) arrived at the Riding-school shortly after eleven, and took their stations in the gallery at the eastern end of the building. Her Majesty and the Prince Consort were accompanied by their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady Per-l, &c. Amongst those who were also present were the Viscountess Jocelyn, Lady Fanny Howard, the Baroness de Speth, the Hon. Miss Devereux, the Hon. Mr. Gould, the Rev J Hawkey, and the Rev. John Cleaver, were present to superintend the proceedings

Very few persons, and those only admitted by tickets signed by Col. Bowles, the Master of the Household, were allowed to be present, with the exception of the Parochial Clergy, the Mayor and Magistrates of the Borough, and the Churchwardens and Overseers.

From the Queen's gallery, the interior of which was tastefully ornamented with holly and laurel, were suspended two beautiful wreaths, surmounted with the Royal Arms The chandeliers in the centre of the building, and also the gas branches along the sides of the Riding School, were similarly ornamented.

Her Majesty and the Prince Consort, with the whole of the Royal visitors and members of the Household, remained until the conclusion of the gratifying proceedings, which occupied about an hour and a half.

COURT AT WINDSOR CASTLE.—Her Majesty will hold a Court at Windsor Castle, at half-past two o'clock to-day, when the Addresses of the Corporations of London and Dublin on the subject of the Corn-laws will be presented.

COLONEL REID AND HIS CONSTITUENTS.—Colonel Reid, M.P., has just addressed a letter to his constituents at Windsor, in which he states, on the subject of his having retired on half-pay from the Lieutenant-Colonelcy of the 3rd Life Guards, that he has relinquished his military command because he feels that, in these critical times, (when constituents have a right to expect from their representatives the truest and most watchful attention to the legislative duties which they have undertaken), it would be difficult for him to discharge the two important functions with equal care and assiduity. Colonel Reid further states that in thus severing himself from the distinguished regiment in which he has served nearly eight-and-twenty years, and to which he is naturally most deeply attached, he offers to his constituents the best proof of the sincerity of his intention to devote his energies, during the time allotted exclusively, to the protection and furtherance of their political and local interests.

THE LATE COL. GURWOOD.—The mortal remains of the late Col. Gurwood have been removed for interment, from the Ordnance, to the Tower, where he obsequies will take place. The appointment of Lieut.-Governor of the Tower, which has become vacant by his demise, is in the gift of the Duke of Wellington.

DEATH OF SIR EDWARD DODSWORTH BAST.—We have to notice the decease of Sir Edward Dodsworth, Bart., which took place on Wednesday, at Thornton Hall his seat, near Bedale, Yorkshire. He was died without issue the baronetcy and estates of Thornton Hall and Newland Park devolve to his brother, Mr. Charles Dodsworth, now Sir Charles, born in 1775, and married in 1808 to Miss Armstrong, only daughter of Mr John Arm-trong, of Lisgold, and grand-daughter of the late Lord Blayney.

DEATH OF DR. MOLLER, THE CONCHOLOGIST.—Accounts have been received of the death of this gentleman, well known for his work on the Mollusca of Greenland, a work which at once established him as one of the most eminent conchologists of his time. Shortly after finishing his studies, two years ago, he was appointed Governor of East Greenland, and had just returned from that inhospitable climate to his native country, when he incurred the intention of visiting England for the purpose of making himself personally acquainted with our conchologists and their collections, and was to have arrived by the end of last month, but he died, after a few days' illness, at Rome. He had sent a nearly complete collection of the shells he had described to the British Museum, shortly after the publication of his work.

THE NAVAL RETRENCHMENT.—The number of captains of the Royal Navy who have volunteered to retire under the offer of the 1st of August last having amounted to no more than 267 and the number required to make the measure of retrenchment effectual being 300, it is somewhat remarkable that they cannot accept of the list for retirement as it now stands, but the whole subject is still under consideration.

A MAN CUT IN TWO ON THE BRIGHTON RAILWAY. A shocking accident occurred on the London and Brighton Railway on Monday evening, by which a railway labourer, named Henry Constable, an aged man, was completely cut asunder. The unfortunate man appears to have been drinking pretty freely with another at the Roebuck, Tinsley-green; and when they left the public-house, the night being dark, the landlady lent them a lantern. They both got on the line, just as the express train was coming down, and unfortunately encountered the train, but Constable himself was knocked down, and the wheels went over his body, completely severing it. The engine-driver fancied that he felt a slight obstruction, but, supposing it to be a sheep, he did not examine the train till he reached Brighton. He then looked at the wheels, when he found part of a man's hat in the gear, and observed the pocket and waistband of a pair of trousers, with a brass pin in the pocket, adhering to the under part of the body of Constable, which was found in a dreadfully mutilated state, was put into a wheelbarrow, and wheeled into the adjoining country

SERIOUS ACCIDENT ON THE GREAT NORTH OF ENGLAND LINE.—On Thursday morning a very serious accident occurred upon the above line. The train left York a little before ten o'clock, A.M., and on arriving at the Thirsk station, it was detained a few minutes, in consequence of a luggage train having preceded it. For some days engineers have been working experimental lines on the Great North of England line, and on that portion between Thirsk and Northallerton more particularly, to the actual exclusion of any of the that could be attended. On Thursday a new engine was brought out, drawing carriages weighted to 70 tons, and at half-past nine o'clock, away went the train like an arrow, reached Thirsk station in about the time expected was increased to a great degree momentum, and when about 400 yards beyond the station, a gentleman who was standing on the bridge observed a violent oscillatory motion, which increased every yard, until the train was fairly rocked over, and thrown upon her broad side against a slight cutting, upon which some of the carriages were thrown, and all more or less damaged. One of the solid beams had seemingly been shivered with as much ease as one would break a reed; the front wheels of another had been carried away, and the buffers tilted up and driven through the side of another. Two men had been fearful, and yet the engineers, most providentially, escaped injury, one man only, the poor fireman, was thrown on his head upon the composite rails, and so seriously injured, that he was not expected to survive very long.

THE ACCIDENT ON THE NORFOLK RAILWAY.—On Wednesday morning Major-General Pasley, the Government Inspector-General of Railways, arrived at Thetford to institute his official inquiry respecting the late overturning of an engine and train on the Norfolk Railway, whereby the engineer and stoker lost their lives. In order to frame his report of the catastrophe for the guidance of the Board of Trade.—On his reaching the station of Thetford, he immediately proceeded to that part of the line where the accident happened—which passes through Brettenton Valley—attended by Mr. Duff, the chairman of the Company; Mr Till, the secretary; Mr. Marshall, the locomotive superintendent; and Mr Merritt, the contractor for the permanent way—and commenced the investigation by inquiring into the state of the road where the engine went off Mr Marshall and Mr. Merritt conducted him about two hundred and fifty feet from where the engine was lying to the broken chair, and then pointed out the exact point, which was twenty-two feet distant. The course of the engine was then minutely described to him. He took a note of these facts, as also the appearance of the rails which had been torn up, and which laid on the side of the line. The engine formed the next object of his inquiry. The principal witnesses, Coldman, the guard who had charge of the train, Todder, the second one, as also the plate-layers, were in attendance to be examined by the General. He, however, did not take their evidence. It was expected that General Pasley would have gone on to Norwich, where the shattered carriages of the train had been taken, as it is his general practice to inspect the effect of an accident, if possible. An important engagement in the north of England, it was understood, prevented him, and he left for London about five o'clock. He did not give any opinion as to the cause of the accident. Since the Inquest, the bodies of the men have been interred at Ely. They were married, and Hedger's widow had only been confined a day or two prior to his dreadful fate

THE ACCIDENT FROM THE BURSTING OF A WATER TANK AT LIVERPOOL.—In great part of our impression last week, we gave an account of the bursting of a tank at the Harrington Water-works, in Rock-street, Liverpool, on Christmas-day, which caused the deaths of five persons, and injured several others. On Wednesday an inquest was held on Mary Ann Smith, Sarah Eliza Smith, Catherine Gibson, John Devaney, and Catherine Gibson, the five persons killed.—Mr. Jameson appeared on the part of the Corporation; Mr. Stanforth on that of the Harrington Company; and Mr. Miller on that of the Hawarden Company. Five witnesses were examined to prove the finding of the bodies and the cause of the deaths. We subjoin such portion of the additional evidence as will be of general interest.—Thomas Thompson sworn: I am manager and chief clerk to the Liverpool and Harrington Water Company. During the summer of 1844, the directors of the company resolved upon having a tank made capable of containing 200,000 gallons of water, for their station in Water-street. The object of the company in having so large a tank was to have an abundant supply of water in case of fire, so that the mains might be filled at a moment's notice, and to supply the shipping at that end of the town. The Hawarden Company had previously done a great deal of work for the Harrington Company, and always very satisfactorily. The tender of the Hawarden Company was accepted. Water-street put in the contract which was entered into between the two Companies.—Witness.—Mr Howell, who is the manager of the Harrington Company, made a plan of a tank, which was adopted by the Harrington Company. Plans comprising the tank were brought over to our yard at various periods when they were ready, and they were put together under the direction of Mr. Howell and his clerk, Mr. Mason. The tank was completed in the early part of last summer, and to two months ago and the reason it was not immediately used was because Mr Howell had to make some service and other pipes not connected with the contract, which prevented it from being ready for use. On Saturday, Mr Maine waited upon me on Christmas-eve, about eight o'clock, and said all was now quite right, and he requested me to attend at the yard the following morning at nine o'clock to see it filled, and also to see what an excellent job they had made of it. I was prevented from attending at the yard of the company the following morning, and did not hear of the accident until half-past two o'clock in the afternoon. One of our own workmen informed me of it. There was no roof to the cistern. I proceeded to the premises, and there saw the houses in Rock-street demolished, and both sides of the tank gone. I had my own opinion as to the cause of the accident, but it was a mere opinion. By Mr. Miller.—The tank was to be erected on a foundation to be prepared by the Harrington Company, and that foundation fixed the situation. The length, breadth, and depth of the tank, showed the quantity of water it was to contain. Christmas-day is a sort of half-holiday at our works. Witnesses were then examined, who corroborated the account we have already given, and the jury returned a verdict of "Accidental Death."

DETERMINED SUICIDE.—On Thursday evening an inquest was held at the Packed Egg, before Mr. Wakley, M.P., on the body of Mr. John Cundale, of the firm of Cundale and Morgan, Italian warehousemen, 43, Anwell-street, Pentonville. On Tuesday last, the inhabitants of Hilford-square were greatly alarmed by the sound of a pistol-shot. Marryat, police-constable 31 G, being on duty, and hearing the report, ran to the house, No. 34, in the square, whence it proceeded. On entering the first floor front room, he was shocked at the spectacle which lay before him. The floor and one of the windows were besmeared with blood; the upper part of the head was quite blown off, and the skull emptied of its contents. The inquest was adjourned.

SUICIDE OF A YOUTH AT SCHOOL.—Late on Wednesday, Mr. Wakley, M.P., Coroner, held an inquest at the Six Bells, Hammersmith, on the body of Mr George Hampton Trenchard, aged nineteen years, who committed suicide by prussic acid on the night of Sunday last.—Mr William Simpson deposed that he lived at Benjamin Hicks, Hammersmith, and was a surgeon. Deceased was witness' pupil, and was nineteen years of age. He was a member of a highly-respectable family. Deceased was found dead by witness on the night of Sunday last, about half-past eleven o'clock, in the premises, at the bottom of witness' garden. After a lengthened inquiry, the Coroner briefly summed up the evidence, remarking on the unusually distressing and painful circumstances of the case; and the jury, after a short consultation, returned a verdict "That the deceased destroyed himself by taking prussic acid while in an unsound state of mind."

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

FRANCE.—Owing to the boisterous weather, the Paris papers of Wednesday did not reach us till a late hour yesterday afternoon. It appears from them, that the Conservative party has triumphed in all the ballots. The Opposition have thus been thoroughly defeated in their determined attempts to embarrass the Ministry. The Journal des Débats, adverting to these successes, says:—"Thus, the success of the Conservative party is complete. The Opposition has been beaten in all the ballots, and by such a majority as we could scarcely have hoped for. With all our desire to be modest, we can no longer conceal its defeat; and, what is most unfortunate for the Opposition is, that it can now find no pretext for palliating this defeat. It is not the right or left wing, or the centre, that is enraged: the entire corps d'armée has been in action. It was impossible to begin the campaign more disastrously, and nearly all the journals of the Opposition here, had the humour to confess it. The journal of M. Thiers (the Constitutionnel) is the only one that does not despair, and that seeks to delude itself as to this unhappy début. It appeals from the secret ballot to persons in the discussion of the budget in open Court. In the present state of affairs we experience no pain in leaving to this journal the possession of these philosophical consolations. The victory obtained by the Ministry had a considerable effect on the Bourse. Funds rose and railway shares followed the upward movement. Count Roy has been appointed President of the Committee on the Address in the Chamber of Peers. The adjudication of the Creil and St. Quentin Railway has been confirmed by a Royal Ordinance. The Débats of Wednesday states that the new Ambassador from Morocco has been received by Louis Philippe, to whom he made a speech, which was answered by his Majesty. For the benefit of our country friends it may be as well to state that the Ambassador's name is Si-el-Barij Abd-el-Kader Ben Mohammed Achache.

HOLLAND.—A letter from the Hague of the 26th ultimo, contains the following:—"We have lately had great changes at Court. One of the King's aides-de-camp and two of the Queen's Chamberlains have been dismissed. The aide-de-camp is Admiral Arriens, who was tutor to Prince Henry, the King's third son, who is now a full Captain. The King is said to have been highly dissatisfied with the manner in which he has brought up this young Prince, whose cavalier manners show that he has been neglected, and too much indulged. It is also remarked that Admiral Arriens had in a degree the off-set of the Minister of Marine, but, in disregard of this, it was given to Admiral Ryk; upon which Admiral Arriens so far forgot himself as to suffer discontent to result in expressions personally irreverent towards the King. The dispute at Baron de Mackay, the Queen's Chamberlain, arose in the following manner:—At the inauguration of the statue of William the Testiturn, the Queen and Prince-ses viewed the ceremony from the balcony of the Baron. A slight rain came on, and the Queen requested the Baron, who was behind her, to procure her an umbrella. According to Court etiquette, it was the Baron's duty to go himself, bring the umbrella, open it, and hold it over her Majesty's head. The Chamberlain, however, ordered a lacquey to do what he himself ought to have done. The Queen said no thing at the time, but very shortly after the ceremony Baron de Mackay received his dismissal from office. The third dismissal is that of M. Van Brienen Jun., the other Queen's Chamberlain, and who is indebted for it to his having, while with the Court, at its last visit to Luxemburg, appeared at the Court entertainments without his official costume and insignia."

RAILWAY LEVELLING SUPERSEDED.—An invention has been put forth by Mr. Ezra Coleman, which, if it be capable of performing what it presents to, will open a new era in the railway system. It is a contrivance for ascending and descending inclined planes with the locomotive engine, and the inventor asserts that by means of it a locomotive engine may ascend or descend 400 feet in a mile or 1 foot in 13, with perfect facility and safety, taking up or down any load that the engine is capable of drawing on a level, at the rate of 15 miles an hour. The invention consists of a central rail, or double rail, upon which are placed a series of friction rollers turning horizontally, with sufficient space between them for the thread of a spiral or endless screw on a drum of large dimensions, which is placed in the direction of the rails, under the engine, and to which motion is given from the driving wheels, by means of bevelled cogs. Besides this central rail there is on the inclined plane an inner track of rails raised a few inches higher than the outer rails; and the increased weight is borne by a series of wheels of smaller diameter, which lift the outer wheels off the main track and bring the whole power of the engine upon the endless screw. The novelty of the invention consists in the principle of working upon the thread of the endless screw between the friction rollers as a substitute for the female screw, and the extra track of rails to bring it into action. It is stated that the cost of the apparatus will not exceed £10,000 in addition to the ordinary construction on the ordinary levels, whereas some of the tunnels have cost £167,000 a mile, and the greater part of the heavy cuttings and embankments will be rendered unnecessary.

THE BIRTH OF THE NEW YEAR.

Proud Nature, mother of the New-born YEAR,
To WINTER brings her youngest charge of love,
And, for his dawn of brightest seasons here,
With a stern (fruteful fervour points above.
"Not ever," so the full oracular tone
Swalleth her prophet voice—"not ever so
Shall the strong fabric nestle near the throne,
Old hoary monarch of the realm of snow!

"Thy home is but one of the tombs of Time,
And he shall soar above it on the wing,
That bears him from his cradle to his prime,
When youth and beauty mashed over his king.
First the SPRING's glory dawns on his young eyes,
Next SUMMER's heat boils high his fiery blood;
Then AUTUMN gluts him with her harvest skies,
And bathes his wearying limbs in Plenty's flood.

"Thus far I am his Herald on with Time
Life's seed—Life's growth Life's harvest shall he see,
Then freezing downward to thy cellar clime
His corpse shall—oh Winter King—be thee.
Back to the dreary regions of thy nest
Old and decrepit shall this fledgeling fly,
I give him now the Cradle of thy Sire,
Thou watcher of his birth shalt see him die."

Silent the Mother's voice—but still her hand
Is upward pointing to the realms of light,
Where HEALTH and PEACE and PLENTY form a band
To woo the Cherub on his early flight.
SPRING with her dainty blossoms and her dew,
With bow of HEALTH and Kisses in her quiver,
SUMMER—sweet goddess!—the idol of the true
With her soft dove that coos of PEACE for ever.

AUTUMN—the garded CERES of the year—
With gleaner's sickle, and with reaper's sheaf,
Making the Crop in PLENTY's lap more dear,
Because it fadeth with the falling leaf.
Like three fair hopes these kindling graces shine
On the young vision of the New Year's birth,
Making his promised future seem divine
In the glad Palace of the glorious Earth.

Health, Peace, and Plenty—all, if these we greet,
The New Year's merry harbingers of joy.
Well may we ring the peal and spread the treat,
To crown the coming of the lusty boy.
For Us—we love his laugh of loudly mirth,
And still shall hold his sprightly advent dear,
While we may wish our Readers, on his birth,
Health, Peace, and Plenty, with a glad NEW YEAR

A GOSSIP OF '45 AND 46.

THE LAST NIGHT OF THE YEAR.

While we write, old 1845 is drawing towards his last breath. He has had a stirring life of it, since he opened his young eyes on the bloodshed of Tahiti, till now that he is closing them on the stir and turmoil of rival parties in England. His last days have not been happy. He leaves a stormy time for his heir—lusty young 1846. The Old Year is glad to be out of it. His dying ears were appalled with talk of failing crops and famine. But all his concern with time is passing away. Let his heir settle it as he best can. All the Years, whose portraits hang in the gallery of history, have left ample lessons for their successors. There never was such a family for perpetuating the good that has come to them. Not a valuable principle, not a great truth, that any of them ever got hold of that he let slip. All has been transmitted—except the evil.

Some of the Years have held that, too, hard, for some generations, mistaking the paste for the diamond; but sooner or later some one of them, putting this and that together, has discovered the blunder and chucked the counterfeit to the ash-hole of oblivion, there to be raked for by industrious worshippers of the past, scratching and groping amidst the leavings of antiquity, in hopes of discovering stray valuables, and continually mistaking pewter spoons for silver. Taking them as we find them, from the time that the first of the name stepped from chaos into the primal world, they are a wonderful family, the Years.

We should reverence them. They have stored up their experiences for us; every one of the long line has written his memoirs; every one carries in his head the collected wisdom of his ancestors, and offers it to us if we will but take it of him.

Old '45 has had a tolerable time of it. He has seen the Income-tax renewed, and breathed the prayer, "Esto Perpetua," for he was decidedly in favour of direct taxation; and young '46 will, we doubt not, carry out the principle. He has grieved over devout Oxford Divines becoming heterodox by sheer excess of orthodoxy, and has pooh-poohed the British Lion when he growled over the Maynooth Grant. He shuddered at the massacre of the Dahra, and charged upon his children, to the remotest time, not to forget it, but to see Colonel Pelissier well requited if he did not live to see it. He got into a passion with Brother Jonathan, when, like his god-father, Jonathan Wilde, he stole Texas from Mexico, and asked her, at the same time, what she meant by her impudence in complaining of it. He was with the Queen and her Consort when she visited the rosery of Rosenau, and grew so fond of her, he then waxing old, and somewhat weak in his affection, that he bequeathed I don't know how many legacies and blessings, and has left it in trust to his son to see them realised for her. And he has seen the League grow from a great fact to a mighty power, and has seen a small cloud rising out of the sea of the future, betokening storm and struggle between opposing forces—how he sighed to think they had not studied his family history to more profit. He had so much in his collections that bore upon the point; saw so much in which both were so strangely wrong, and yet could be so soon set right had they but known how to interpret the volumes of his library, which has been in the course of collection ever since Time began, and which contains all truth and knowledge. In fact, Old '45 has seen more than most years, if we may measure things by their consequences.

But the Years are a line of Kings. Their succession fails not: they never die. "The King is dead—Long live the King." '45 is departed—Huzzah for '46.

He frothed his bumpers to the brim;—
A jollier year we shall not see:
But though his eyes are waxing dim,
And though his foes speak ill of him,
He was a friend to me.
Old Year, you shall not die,
We did so laugh and cry with you,
I've half a mind to die with you,
Old Year, if you must die.

He was full of joke and jest,
But all his merry quips are o'er.
To see him die, across the waste,
His son and heir doth ride post-haste,
But he 'll be dead before.
Every one for his own;
The pi ot is starry and cold, my friend,
And the New Year, blithe and bold, my friend,
Comes up to take his own!

Our artist has commemorated worthily this death and birth in the family of Time.

The Old and dying Year is surrendering his infant heir into the hands of "rude Winter, that rough nurse," who points to her more genial sisters, and speaks hope of coming Spring, and Summer, and Autumn, so that the infant almost forgets the drifting snow in the cheery influence of Winter's kindly talk, and the blaze of the Christmas log. But the illustration is conceived in too happy a vein to be worthily dealt with in aught less melodious than metre.

Old '45, on his death-bed, gives his infant heir, '46, in charge to Winter, with his blessing.

Take him to thee, Winter wild,
And a blessing on the child:
Storm of face, thy heart is mild,
I am waxing wan and weak—
Scarce have breath my thoughts to speak.
Bless the boy! When I am sped,
Lach him honour of the dead.
May he be a happy Year,
Blessed with plenty, gay of cheer,
Though that scarce may be, I fear!

He gives the child to Winter, and sinks back, giving up the ghost. Winter comforteth the young Year.

Come, my nursling, come away,
From thy father's senseless clay.
Fear me not, though dark and cold;
In my ermine mantle's fold
I will wrap thee safe from harm,
Lull'd with carol in my arm;
With household talk and old world cheer,
I will warm thee, Baby dear!
For my house is gay to-night,
With wassail bowl and faggot bright,
Ringing with glad talk and laughter,
Echoing up from floor to rafter.
Kindly thoughts and dreams of home,
Whereso farthest men do roam,
Hang about the thought of me,
Whom many bless, stern though I be.
When to hardihood thou 'rt grown,
With my rough winds bravely blown,
With my sharp frosts stoutly brac'd,
And keen airs that thou hast fac'd,
Till the pulling, pasing brat
Hath come to boyhood, fresh and fat—
Then I'll give thee from my hand
To my sisters' gentler band.
Sparkling Spring shall deck thy hair
With her leaflets fresh and fair;
Rear thee up with sun and showers
In tender green of budding bowers,
Till the child to lad hath grown—
Then shall swart Summer clasm her own,
With bold black eyes the Passions fan,
That tell the youth he's grown to man.
With her thou'lt seek the forest dim,
And stretch thee at the streamlet's brim;
And learn the glory of the earth,
And how much busy life-breath is worth,
Till, flushed and faint, from Summer's charms
Thou passest into Autumn's arms;
And, in her sober mellowed grace,
Fondest age creeping on apace;
Yet not unblessed, with richest store
That Earth from liberal lap doth pour;
Till, grown to feebleness, thou 'rt fain
To creep thee to my arms again;
And on old Winter's breast to close
The life that on her breast arose.

So—Farewell to thee, old '45; and welcome to thy heir, lusty young '46!

THE BIRTH OF THE NEW YEAR.—DRAWN BY WILLIAM HARVEY

HAYMARKET THEATRE.

Considerable interest was excited in the dramatic world when it was announced that Miss Cushman, the American tragic actress, was about to appear at this theatre as Romeo, and, accordingly, on Monday evening, a very large audience assembled to witness the attempt. Miss Cushman, our readers may remember, was engaged last season at the Princess' Theatre, and created a great sensation by her performance of some of our leading heroines in tragedy. She was there triumphantly successful, and equally so in a series of provincial engagements, which she subsequently fulfilled in our principal towns, and, if we mistake not, in Ireland. The highest encomiums were passed upon her acting by the entire press, both in London and the country; and she was pronounced at once to be the finest actress that had appeared on our boards for many years. Hence the greatest curiosity was manifested to see her in her novel essay. It is an unusual thing to find a female bold enough to undertake the part of the hero of one of Shakspeare's tragedies. We believe Miss Ellen Tree (now Mrs. Charles Kean) appeared as Romeo a few years since. But Miss Cushman had given such evidence of her power and intensity, that there was little doubt of her success; which was, in a word, most decided. We have never seen the character better played. Her energy and passion, coupled with an extraordinary assumption of manly character and bearing, was almost marvellous. In her bursts of anger, or despair, we altogether lost sight of the woman: every feminine characteristic was entirely thrown aside in her powerful interpretation of the rôle. Her singular resemblance, at the same time, to Mr. Macready, must have struck everybody in the house; even to his attitudes and inflections of voice. But it was not a copy: we can conceive that Miss Cushman acted in the same manner even before she had seen that gentleman: the likeness is natural and physical: in addition, she has sufficient genius to rely upon her own perceptions, instead of following the results of another's. The applause throughout was genuine and most enthusiastic. A sister of the lady, Miss Susan Cushman, appeared on the same evening as Juliet. She is a clever actress, of considerably more than average abilities, but lacks the intensity of her sister. Her figure is commanding, and her face handsome; her declamation, too, evidenced education and intelligence; but there was nothing very remarkable in her delineation of the heroine —indeed, many actresses now on our boards could play Juliet in a manner immeasureably superior. The prestige of her sister's name was, however, greatly in her favour; and the audience being most kindly disposed towards her, she could not complain of any lack of applause. Indeed, at the end of the tragedy the cheering was loud and general, and the two sisters appeared to receive the hearty approbation of the crowded house. Mrs. Glover was an admirable Nurse; Mr. Stuart a respectable Friar Lawrence, albeit somewhat too mournful, and Mr. Buckstone comical enough as Peter. We cannot say much in favour of Mr. Holl's Mercutio. The character was evidently out of his line, and, in his hands, degenerated to a farce Captain. Where was Mr. Hudson? We conceive that he would have been a far more efficient representative.

The general getting up of the tragedy does not reflect much credit on the management. We never look for anything remarkable in the way of scenery at the Haymarket; but on the present occasion it was atrociously bad. And a dance in the bull scene was so inelegant, that it first brought down a shower of hisses, and then a burst of ironical laughter. For the dreary attempt it was, it was very funny.

The "Cricket on the Hearth" is advertised for production on Tuesday next. The cast comprises Messrs. Farren, Webster, Buckstone, Tilbury, Mrs. Seymour, Miss Julia Bennett, and Mrs. W. Clifford.

MISS CUSHMAN AS "ROMEO," AND MISS SUSAN CUSHMAN AS "JULIET," AT THE HAYMARKET THEATRE.

MISS KELLY.

To-night, the Amateurs, who so lately distinguished themselves by their enactment of Ben Jonson's "Every Man in his Humour," will perform for the benefit of Miss Kelly, at her little theatre, in Dean-street, Soho. The play will be Beaumont and Fletcher's "Elder Brother;" and the farce, "Comfortable Lodgings."

We have availed ourselves of this opportunity to introduce to our readers a portrait of the clever bénéficiaire. Miss Kelly, if our theatrical memory serves rightly, appeared at Drury Lane some forty years since in the very interesting farce of "Mary the Maid of the Inn." Her next great success was as Ophelia; a better representative of that Shakesperian creation has never appeared on the stage.

After this, Miss Kelly joined the Lyceum Company, where she remained until the destruction of the theatre by fire. Among her triumphs at that popular establishment, her intense personation of The Serjeant's Wife will not soon be forgotten by the play-goers of our time: as a deep and powerful melo-dramatic performance, it has scarcely been equalled. In an opposite vein was her Betty Finikin (in the farce of "Gretna Green"), which sent home many an audience aching with laughter.

Miss Kelly's next performance was, altogether, in another line. Possessing a highly sensitive mind, she became dissatisfied at the treatment experienced from managers; and, accordingly, Miss Kelly opened, per se, that little band-box, the Strand Theatre, with a mono-dramatic performance, entitled Mrs. Parthian At Home. Here her versatile genius had its long range: now melting her audience into tears at some pathetically told anecdote; then convulsing them with her exquisite personation of fine farce. We cannot, at this moment, settle the precise year of Miss Kelly's first appearance on the stage; but that she played the Prince to Mrs. Siddons's Constance, in "King John," is kept in our recollection by one of the anecdotes in her monologue above mentioned. The trait was related to prove that some actors feel their art; for, after each performance, Miss Kelly's shirt-collar was wet with the tears of Constance, or, rather, of the impassioned Mrs Siddons

Frances Maria Kelly, the daughter of Mr. Mark Kelly, was born at Brighton, Dec. 15, 1790. She was articled to Michael Kelly, her uncle, under whom she studied music and singing. In 1800, she was one of the chorus-singers at Old Drury-Lane Theatre, and also played a few little parts that her age and stature enabled her to assume. From this period she commenced studying the theory of her profession: was a diligent attendant at the theatres, and a great admirer of Mrs. Jordan's acting. In 1807, she appeared at Glasgow; and in 1808, at the Haymarket Theatre, but with trifling success. In 1810, she joined the Drury-Lane Company, then at the Lyceum, with better success. In 1811, her performance in "M.P.; or, The Blue Stocking," drew a warm eulogium from the poet Moore. She next joined the Drury-Lane Company, at the new theatre; and shortly after had a pistol fired at her by one of the audience (a lunatic), whilst she was performing in "Modern Antiques." At Drury-Lane, however, Miss Kelly scarcely attained so prominent a position as that which she subsequently filled at the English Opera House.

A TALE OF BRITTANY.

FROM THE FRENCH.

To prevent any misconception on the readers' part, we will tell them at once, that our hero, except in his piteous fate, had nothing in common with the hero of Pharsalia. On the contrary, he was a quiet, worthy creature, free from any taint of ambition; and would not have shed a single tear of jealousy, had he seen a dozen statues of Alexander of Macedon. He passed a guiltless and tranquil existence, scrupulously fulfilling the duties and practising the virtues befitting his social position.

The ancestors of Cæsar had for many generations served the noble house of Bazouge Kerhoat, one of the most ancient, exalted, and powerful in Brittany —the only Seigneurs, indeed, who could at all enter into comparison with M. de Bazouge in any of these respects, were those of Rieux and Rohan.

You might have sought about a very long time, before you found so fine a dog as Cæsar; for Cæsar was a dog. His portrait at full length, which adorns the dining hall of the Château de Kerhoat, attests that he was a magnificent fellow, tall, broad-chested, firm, erect, and stately; one that would receive an attack with the firmness of a rock, or rush upon his enemy with the restless impetuosity of the ocean wave. His coat was white, with chesnut spots; and though his nose was that of a mastiff, he had fine long ears, and soft, silky, curly hair falling from his back in glossy richness. He had at once the look of the wolf-hound, the mastiff, and the spaniel; but we are not sufficiently versed in canine physiology to pronounce of what particular breed he was an ornament. Around his neck glittered a slight brass collar, stamped with the arms of Bazouge, from which depended a small silver medal bearing the initials H. B., to indicate that Cæsar belonged, in especial property, to Mademoiselle Henriette de Bazouge.

In the year 1793, Cæsar was three years old.

At this period, the fine Château de Kerhoat no longer presented that aspect of life and happiness which but lately gladdened the hearts of its many guests in those joyous days, when M. de Bazouge kept open house during the session of the States of Brittany. Standing three leagues from Rennes, on the borders of the great forest of the same name, the noble Château, on all these occasions, became the home of a large portion of the grandees who attended the sessions from the more distant parts of the province. Every evening the vast saloons were crowded with a gay and glittering throng. Thousands of rich crystals in the magnificent chandeliers cast their gorgeous rays over the elaborate carving of the ceiling and the wainscoted walls, over the splendid but now sombre frames of the family portraits, and over the glowing colours, so learnedly blended, of the armorial bearings. Then came the elegant suppers, whereat some cavalier just returned from Paris would recount the strange things that were passing there, and the gentlemen grew pale with anger, and the ladies were all astonishment that there should be a woman so lovely as Marie Antoinette, a man so ugly and yet so fascinating as M. de Mirabeau. After supper came the ball—the anti-revolutionary ball—with its dances so grave, so graceful, so gallant; so prince-like, so regal; so simple, yet so dignified; so characteristic a memory of the noble manners of the days of chivalry.

But now the crystals no longer glittered; the vast corridors were no longer crowded with gallant cavaliers, sweeping the floors with their white feathers and jewelled hats, as they handed along the ladies of their love; they and their fair dames were all gone. The festival and the dance no longer sent forth their joyous sounds; the halls were deserted and silent; the splendour all extinct; and if, in the silence of night, a light shone upon the austere faces of the old Seigneurs of Kerhoat on the dark canvas, it was a pale ray of the moon making its way furtively between the dusty fringes and the heavy curtains. Yet the Château itself remained just the same as ever, with its four high and massive towers rising proudly from the four corners, guarding, like sleepless sentinels, the symmetrical proportions of the main edifice. There still remained the immense range of stabling on the one side; and on the other, the offices, vast enough to lodge at their ease, a whole army of domestics. But the offices were altogether deserted; and in the vast solitude of the stables two horses shivered by themselves. An evil genius had hovered, with black wings, over Kerhoat, tarning its joys into sorrow, its splendour and its power, into nothingness.

Within the last two years, the present head of the house of Bazouge, an old man of eighty winters, had lost his four eldest sons—two of them on the Revolutionary scaffold—two of them in the army of Condé. His fifth son—the only child now remaining to him—was in arms for his King, in La Vendée. M. de Bazouge occupied the Château de Kerhoat, with his granddaughter. Hitherto, his advanced age, and the veneration in which he was held by his former vassals, had secured him from outrage at the hands of the Revolutionists. The peasants of Noyal-sur-Vilaine, and the foresters of Kerhoat, presented themselves respectfully before him, when, at distant intervals, leaning upon the arm of Henriette, the old Seigneur took the air in the park which once formed a portion of his domain. Some of the men ventured even to say to him, in an under tone, "God bless you, notre Monsieur;" while the women—whose moral courage is at all times, and under all circumstances, greater than that of men—openly saluted the young lady with a cordial, but deferential, "Good day, notre Mademoiselle." These, however, were the utmost marks of respect and sympathy which either men or women dared to display; they were but three leagues from Rennes, a city which, with but 25,000 souls, had no fewer than five guillotines, whose precincts were quite sufficient to suggest prudence and caution to even the least prudent and the least cautious.

The only servants retained by M. de Bazouge were the gardener, and La Pierre, a brave and faithful adherent, whose father, grandfather, and great-grandfather, had lived and died in the Château de Kerhoat.

Mademoiselle Henriette de Bazouge was a sweet girl of thirteen, whose naturally joyous countenance had been overshadowed with melancholy by the heavy misfortunes which had, in the last two years, nearly extinguished her race. She surrounded her grandfather with the most unceasing and respectful attentions. In the morning, when M. de Bazouge awoke, the first object that met his eyes was Henriette. She would read to him by the hour together; and when the sad memory of the past brought a cloud more sombre than usual over the old man's face, she would kneel by his side, and sing gentle songs, whose melody would gradually dispel the bitterness at its heart, as the morning frost melts away before the sun of May. Fading both his hands upon her noble brow, M. de Bazouge would then smooth down the flowing curls of her fair hair, and kiss and bless her, offering up to Heaven a fervent thanksgiving, that at least this angelic being remained to him, to console the closing hours of his life.

Every evening the old man and the young girl knelt down, side by side, and prayed: the one for his four sons, martyrs in what they deemed the holiest of holy causes, and for the son who lived but to offer himself up as a sacrifice whenever the same great cause should require it; the other, for her father. When the prayer was finished, the old man, still kneeling, would cry aloud, his sword-hand raised on high, his eye glowing with loyal fervour, "God save the King!" and the low, sweet voice of Henriette repeated, "God save the King!"—the same cry that, perhaps, at that very moment the dying lips of the last male Bazouge were gasping forth on some distant battle-field in La Vendée.

All this while, Cæsar lay stretched out at full length in a corner of the apartment; his grey eyes fixed, beaming with devoted affection, upon his young mistress. When, perchance, her glance fell upon him, he would half rise up, stretch out his legs, and joyously draw in a long breath. All day long, he scarcely ever lost sight of her; and at night, when she retired to her chamber, he lay across the door outside, after the fashion of the Gentlemen of the Bedchamber of the ancient Kings of Portugal.

Whenever Henriette put her foot out of the Château, Cæsar bounded round and round her in an ecstasy of delight. Then he would dash off like lightning down one garden walk, and up another, leaping over the great flower beds, and, tearing back to his mistress, bound round and round her again, and stick his nose in the gravel at her feet, and roll over and over on the grass, and go through a thousand antics, to express his enormous happiness. M. de Bazouge he loved; but Henriette he worshipped. At a single word from her he would have quitted his bone, though never so hungry; nay, we are not sure that, under her influence, he wouldn't even have consented to sign a treaty of peace with the great tom-cat that was wont to frolic him from the roof of the stables, and against whom he had an hereditary vendetta.

At one corner of the home park of Kerhoat, there was a little hermitage where, by some chance or other, the crucifix had been allowed to remain standing. To this spot Henriette daily directed her steps, when her grandfather was reading or taking his siesta; and the most important duty with which Cæsar was charged was the escorting his mistress on these little excursions. As soon as he saw her turn the key of the garden door, his manner altogether changed: his pace became slow, his deportment grave and serious, as though he was fully impressed with the weighty responsibility that attached to him. It was a responsibility, however, to which he was by no means inadequate; he had a piercing eye, a powerful frame, and a set of teeth strong enough to exterminate the largest wolf that might present itself. Unhappily the wild beasts at that time infesting France were far more numerous and far more mischievous than wolves.

One day La Fierre returned from Noyal with alarm strongly depicted on his countenance. He had learned that the Revolutionary authorities at Rennes were annoyed with themselves for having left so near them, alive and in peace, an old Royalist Nobleman, who had to his own share more titles than half the States put together. Accordingly, the District Representative was, current report said, about to make a descent upon the Château de Kerhoat. M. de Bazouge received this intelligence like a Christian and a soldier; though, when he looked at Henriette, his eyes involuntarily filled with tears. She was so young, so good, so beautiful! at her birth so brilliant and joyous a destiny seemed to open before her! Around her cradle, the assembled family predicted for her some illustrious alliance, a splendid and happy career. Alas! that family was now all but extinct, and the jaws of death seemed to yawn for the survivors!

"God's will be done!" murmured M. de Bazouge, wiping away a forbidden tear. "Long live the King!" he exclaimed, resuming all his firmness.

"Long live the King!" repeated Henriette.

"Long live the King!" echoed a deep, grave voice, behind them.

Cæsar leaped with transport towards the new comer, a man of lofty height, whose face was concealed by the broad brim of his hat, which bore a white cockade, while his person was enveloped in a vast cloak. He paused at the threshold.

"Who art thou?" demanded the Seigneur de Bazouge.

The Stranger, after patting Cæsar on the head, as if to thank him for his good reception, threw off his hat and cloak.

"My father!" "My child!" exclaimed, with one voice, Henriette and her grandsire.

And, pressing those loved beings to his breast, he, whom they thus addressed, repeated, "My father!" "My child!"

It was the last male heir of the Bazouges of Kerhoat—Henry, Viscount of Plenars. He came from the neighbourhood of Beaupreau, where he had left the division which he commanded in the Royal and Catholic Army. His boots were covered with dust, his spurs with blood.

When his joy had somewhat calmed, the old man, while his son was pressing Henriette again and again to his heart, fell into a sombre reverie. At length, "Henry," he said, "what may I judge from this sudden return? Is the war at an end? Is there no corner of France left, in which we can still plant our standard?"

The Viscount pointed to his cockade. "Sir," he replied, "my brothers died as it became your sons to die. I trust I shall not dishonour them or you. When the white flag falls, I shall fall with it. The war will never be at an end while there remains a son of Bazouge-Kerhoat to strike a blow for his King!"

M. de Bazouge took the hand of his son, and wrung it with passionate earnestness.

"Oh!" he cried, "could I but——"

"Sir," interrupted the Viscount, "there would then be one heroic soldier the more in the Royal army: but our poor Henriette would be left alone in the world. Ah, my father, how lovely she is! How like her sainted mother!"

The memory of her they had lost, brought tears into the eyes of Henriette and her grandfather, and threw a cloud of deep sadness over the features of the haughty and hardy soldier. Throwing off the impression by a strong effort, the Viscount drew his father aside, and explained the cause of his coming. The rigorous measures adopted by the Republican authorities were becoming day by day more severe throughout France against the favourers of Royalty; and the Viscount, taking advantage of a temporary check which his division had given to the enemy, had hastened to Kerhoat for the purpose of inducing his father to fly with Henriette to England while there was yet time.

"I ask it of you, Sir," he urged, "not for your own sake—I know your great soul too well—but for the sake of this poor child, who is now our only joy, our only hope! You will not refuse to save her life?"

M. de Bazouge at first peremptorily rejected the idea of flight. Too old for active service, he yet wished to brave the coming danger in the house of his ancestors; but his passionate love for his grand-daughter prevailed.

"Well, my child," he at length said, "I will for once turn my back upon my enemies; but it is that thou mayest live, that thou mayest live for happier days."

The Viscount had already taken the measures he deemed necessary. He had sent a trusty messenger to Granville to prepare shipping, and his own immediate followers, faithful adherents of the House of Bazouge, who had accompanied him to the Royal army, waited in the forest, close by, to serve as an escort for the fugitives. It was arranged that they should quit the Château the same night, and, meantime, in order to avoid all risk of suspicion, the Viscount returned to his followers. La Fierre immediately set about the welcome task of preparing the travelling carriage.

Be as brave as you may, at the age of Henriette, at all events, you cannot look death in the face without a shudder. When she heard of the escape prepared for her from the threatened danger, she was full of joy. Yet, the moment after, a secret anguish came upon her, at the reflection that she was about to quit, perhaps for ever, the beloved home, in which she had passed so many happy years. She ran to bid adieu to each well-known spot throughout the Château, followed by Cæsar, who seemed to comprehend and share in her varying feelings. Then she went into the garden and gathered a bouquet, so that she might, for a long time to come, preserve, in a foreign land, in the land of exile, the sweet flowers of Kerhoat, even when they should have faded, like her fortunes. As the hour of separation approached, everything around her assumed a double charm. The old Château grew more noble, more venerable, than ever; the garden more delicious, with its symmetrically ranged rich flower beds, and meandering shrubberies; and the oaks which overlooked the garden walls waved to and fro their massive foliage more gracefully and proudly.

Nothing in this world seems so charming as that which we are about to lose, except, perhaps, that which we have already lost.

As the evening was closing in, Henriette felt a strong impulse once more to kneel before the crucifix at the little hermitage. Traversing the park under the protection of Cæsar, she soon reached the desired spot—a hillock which overlooked the country towards Rennes. When she had offered up her devotions, Henriette seated herself upon the grass and fell into a mournful reverie. Cæsar lay at full length by her side. His eyes were half closed to avoid a ray of the setting sun, which, making its way through the foliage, teasingly played among his eyelashes. He seemed half asleep.

All at once, he started up and uttered a low growl. His head firmly set on high and his body stretched out, his great eyes became fixed in the direction of Noyal. Henriette followed that indication, and turned pale. On the road from Noyal, four men on horseback were rapidly advancing, and she recognised the dreaded uniform of the Republic.

She rose, and, quick as her trembling limbs would bear her, hastened to the Castean. Cæsar passed for an instant, to send a bark of fierce defiance at the distant horsemen, a challenge that was immediately answered by a great bloodhound whom one of the soldiers had in a leash.

At Kerhoat, as in all the old Châteaux, there were some hiding places, known only to the Seigneur and his family. Henriette had the advantage of the Republicans by a full quarter of an hour, which gave her time to conquer the scruples of her grandfather, and induce him to take refuge in one of these secret chambers, after he had put on his uniform, and hung round his neck the Orders he had received from his Sovereign. This was a point the old man insisted upon; if he were discovered, let him, at all events, not die in undress.

Cæsar stretched himself across the invisible door of the chamber of refuge.

A few moments after the retreat had been effected, three soldiers, under the command of the Republican Representative at Rennes, presented themselves at the gate of the Chateau, and were admitted, as need was, by La Fierre, who had heard nothing about their approach, and who was immediately made a prisoner.

"Where's thy master?" demanded the leader of the party.

"At Guernsey," replied La Fierre, without hesitation.

The visitants made very few words at this intimation, but their countenances cleared up when they saw the travelling carriage in a corner of the court-yard.

"Miserable traitor!" exclaimed the Representative, "thou hast lied to the Republic! Dismount, citizens: bind that scoundrel to some sure place, and let us examine this hotbed of aristocrats."

La Fierre was fastened to an iron ring in the stable wall. The Representative then let loose the bloodhound.

"Hi, Rustand! look out, good dog. To 'em! to 'em!"

The animal, long trained to the chace of men, dashed up the grand staircase, filling the Château with his loud baying. His masters followed him.

Meantime, La Fierre made every effort to release himself, but the interwoven cords of the strong harness defied his efforts. He could only look on, and listen to the bloodhound's baying, as it ascended the staircase, and then to the shouts of the soldiers, as they followed it from room to room.

Then all was silent for a few minutes, during which La Fierre, in the agony of despair, tore his flesh with his teeth, in order to get at the cords that bound him.

Suddenly, the bloodhound's baying was heard in the court-yard, and the soldiers, with the Representative at their head, appeared, dragging Rustand after them.

"Where's the traitor?" cried the Representative.

"Here," replied the soldiers, pointing to the empty stable.

"Search the premises!" cried the Representative, in a rage.

"Search the premises!" repeated the soldiers, as they rushed into the house.

"Where's the traitor?" cried the Representative, as they returned purpose giving the third game, with any further intelligence respecting the progress of the match, with which we may be favoured in the interval.

GAME THE FIRST.

* To avoid the heaviness and monotony wh ch are supposed to characterise the "King's Pawn one," or "close game," it was suggested, we believe, that both parties should play "K's Pawn two" at the first move

† The best rejoinder to White's move, according to Heydebrant and Jaenisch ‡ Paying the Q Kt over to this side, when the advance King has Castled with K's Rook is a favourite manœuvre of our best players in the present day

¶ White gains this move, at least, by the exchange of pieces.

‖ "K R P one," in our opinion, would have been much better play.

 Now, the grave fault Black committed in allowing the adversary's B to be posted at K Kt 4th sq is strikingly apparent.

†† We are very glad to have an instructive example to young players of the importance of gaining time at Chess. Had White played in his attack to recover the lost Bishop, the adversary might have succeeded in dislodging one or other of the pieces by which he is beleaguered, or in bringing his own forces to the rescue, and then have ultimately retrieved the game.

‡‡ And this, after twenty moves only, terminated the opening game of this long-talked of match. Subsequent comments upon a struggle so brief and short-lived is needless—with the exception of White's conc uding moves, it presents no points of mark and interest whatever, and would suffer gre tly in comparison with most of the published games of these amateurs played under ordinary circumstances.

19. Kt to K Kt 3rd	Kt to Q 5th‡		White resign. ‡‡

* By Castling now White appears to have thrown away all the advantage this open ng gives to the first player. The correct move is Q B's P one.

† We should prefer playing Pawn to K B's 4th at this stage

‡ In his apprehension of the threatened advance of Black's K B's P, White seems to have quite overlooked the more dangerous move of his Kt to Q 5th.

§ It was impossible, we believe to save both the pawns.

Had Black played on his K's Pawn now, instead of moving the Kt, White would probably have taken the P at Q B's 5 h with his Bishop.

¶ The beginning of the end. White's last few moves afforded his active opponent time to accumulate a force upon the King's quarters, which is quite irresistible

 Properly played; if the Kt is taken, Mate follows in three moves.

†† In this game White makes a longer f ot a better fight than in the preceding one; but the play is certainly below the ordinary standard of his games. Neither player indeed, as yet seems to have "warmed to his work;" after a few more games we shall have both upon their mettle, and then some play worthy of themselves and the occasion may be looked for.

THE THEATRES.

We were enabled, in our late edition of last week, to give a short notice of the manner in which all the principal Christmas entertainments had been received, in addition to an account of their plots and chief effects, which we were enabled to report through the politeness of those connected with the different managements. Since then we have been present at the representation of most of them, and are enabled to speak, both individually and collectively, of the various pantomimes and burlesques. The theatres have been nightly crowded to overflowing: at the Lyceum, for example, six hundred persons came into the pit with the first rush on Monday evening, as we are informed: and the other houses appear to be doing equally well. But, we must, in candour, state that we do not consider any of them up to the mark. In the first place, the usual extravaganza is, perhaps, the best, with respect to graceful pointed writing and the beauty of the mise en scene; but even this does not "go" with the audience like one of those occasions by the same author.

It may not be out of place to say a few words upon this general deficiency of attraction. The flat manner in which all the plays appear to have been received on "Boxing Night," and more especially the pantomimes, was in a great measure owing to a lack of novelty and meaning in the various effects. Conventionality, with a singular clinging to tradition al business, is the base of all our management. The scanty number of our actors moves in a most limited sphere; the theatre in which they are engaged is their world, and they know but little of what is going on beyond it; they scarcely, even, take any interest in the business or progress of other establishments. This same limited intelligence is observable in all the departments of a theatre; stage-managers, carpenters, and even scene-painters are alike opposed to innovation, and every dramatic author is aware that any reply to any proposition for a new effect, or of nature from the established system, is always, "Such a thing was never heard of," and the very reason why it ought to be done. Again, there is not in our theatres one general superintendant of the ensemble, who, while he understands, practically, the works of all the departments, possesses, in addition an artistic taste, and capacity for working out any effect poetically, producing something beyond the hack system of "set trays," "vampers," "slotes," and other appliances, with the action of which the public are now as well acquainted as any boy in the land. All the scenes. The combined intelligence of Mr. Planché and Mr W Bradwell, during the Yeatsy dynasty at Covent Garden, did much towards educating the eyes of the play-going world to look for something of a more imaginative kind than the time-honoured conventionalities they had been accustomed to; but, in point of excellence, beauty, and esthetic perfection of detail, "Acis and Galatea" may be mentioned as standing alone.

To the exclusively modern, we cannot come near the Paris theatres. For this reason a gorgeous féerie as Boa, when brought from the Porte St. Martin to Drury-lane, as "The Princess who was Changed into a Swan," awed the first night, for this reason, also, the tremendous scene in the same piece of "La Roche Fermée," united in the Drury-lane version, but evidently intended to form the grand de bataille of the Lyceum burlesque, was totally failed. There who chanced to see this "tableau" in Paris—the wild towering rocks, with the wonderful atmosphere that gave such distance to the higher portions the real water sparkling over the edge of the gorge, and leaping from one rock to another until it was lost in the depths of the precipice—the ghastly appearance of the skeletons in the hooks of black stone—will remember how all these elements combined to form one magnificent effect which attracted all Paris for months. In the "Enchanted Horse" the summit of the mountain appears to be as close to the audience as its base, and a clumsy huge jack-towel, striped with blue and silver, goes round and round to form the water fall—splashing, frothing, and now and then giving a turn the wrong way, looking as much like a cascade as the slipper-bath in a green petticoat, so frequently seen in our theatres, approximates to a basin. But this slipper-bath is endowed by stage carpenters with many perfections; there is, besides, sure to be one in the hot ... and so it is always used, and always will be.

The taste for pantomimes is evidently on the decrease: and, indeed, has been so for some years. The openings, it is true, amuse, for there is generally some little novelty in their treatment; but the harlequinade is sadly wearying, the chief cause of this being, perhaps, the want of a perfect understanding, finishing, and now the characters are changed, they lose all connexion with the introductory portion of the entertainment. The Harlequin and Clown part of any one pantomime might be grafted on the opening of any other without any incongruity being required. Our notions, also, of what is really funny, have undergone a wonderful change during the last ten years; and the panto mimists have not kept pace with the times. They adhere to their old business as scrupulously as formerly, and any gentleman still affect dessian boots and powder, or big watch-chains, whose use such things were once popular

We admit it is difficult to get them from the beaten track; but until this is done there is little hope for improvement in our Christmas Entertainment.

FRENCH PLAYS.

"The Femme de Quarante Ans," a piece which has had an immense run in Paris, has been brought out at the St. James's theatre since we last noticed the part it enacted. The idea of the play is derived from the heroine, who is a widow, aged forty, married to a young man of twenty-five. The honeymoon has been passed in retirement in the country, where all their enjoyments have been purely of a simple and pastoral nature. They arrive in Paris, and the lady, fearing that the gaieties of the season may disturb the course of the affections of her husband, does all in her power to prevent his seeking any amusement away from his home. This caprice, however, threatens considerable interruption to their matrimonial peace, and their discontent is increased by a various contretemps which happens. She has a daughter of seventeen years of age, whom she has studiously kept out of sight, lest the superior charms of youth and beauty might affect the power of her own. The persons to whom she has entrusted her daughter, to form her husband of the circumstance connected with her: and request her hand for a young man, one of his many friends. He readily gives his consent; but there is a difficulty in obtaining that of the mother to the proposed match. Serious diff rences arise between husband and wife, and some fierce domestic broils lead to a separation by mutual consent. The irritated la y, moreover, learns from an old domestic, that a young lady has ... visited her husband; and exchanged with him, as she judges, over-affectio ate significations of friendship. Upon this, she determines to watch her husband, and have a full explanation; and unfortunately discovers that the young lady is concealed in a closet. She taunts him with the usual epithets made use of on such occasions: in vain the husband tries to appease her. She rushes to the closet, tears open the door, and discovers that it is her own daughter. Shame and penitence immediately succeed; and her husband, who is really devotedly attached to her, pardons her. Her daughter is made happy with the desired husband, and all becomes reconciled

Mdlle. Martellier played the part of the wife—the first character of any importance that has yet been allotted to her; and we were pleased at finding our predictions verified concerning the great talent of this actress. Her dramatic conceptions are of a lofty and serious character; and mete trifling rôles in vaudeville are unsuited to her. She played admirably throughout the piece, in most powerful, but without force or exaggeration Her sentiment was very touching and refined; and "the plentiful moisture" that bedewed every eye in the house, was the best testimony of the true and natural feeling displayed by the actress. One deficiency alone struck us, and this was, that smiles failed to make visible in her, any of the fading fascinations which usually characterise Une Femme de Quarante Ans.

At the conclusion of the play, the curtain was raised again, and Mdlle Martellier came forward, in obedience to a hearty summons from every corner of the house. M. Rosseul sustained the part of the husband with much intelligence and effect; and M. Cartigny, as an old and faithful domestic, was, as he always is, exceedingly humorous. The rest of the parts reflected great credit on the artistes who rendered them: and we must give every praise to the charming simplicity of Mdlle. Heloise, in the character of the daughter. The houses have been, as usual, well and fashionably attended.

ADELPHI.

It requires no entymologist to tel, us that the Cricket tribe is rapidly promulgated. In a few days time there will be one chirping in every corner of the land, all the theatres in London. The second adaptation of Mr. Dickens's book was brought out at the house on Wednesday evening, the dramatic version having been arranged by Mr. Edward Stirling. Having already given the plot, it is not necessary to repeat it: we will merely allude to the acting and the manner in which the drama has been produced, premising, however, that from the dramatic construction of the or ginal work, there is necessarily very little variation, in the course of the incidents, from the version already given at the Lyceum. Mr O. Smith is entitled to the highest praise, for his very admirable performance of the Cricket. His acting of the character throughout was fine artistic conception, perfectly embodying the creation of the author: and Mrs Fitzwilliam, even with Mr. Keeley fresh in our memory, was a lively, bustling, affectionate little Dot, that Boz himself must have approved of. Miss Woolgar performed the blind part of the Stranger with care and propriety. The other characters call for no remark either one way or the other. A very lively dance concluded the piece, which was unanimously encored, and after the curtain fell, the principal performers were called for and appeared. The applause was loud and unmistakable, and the piece achieved a perfect success. It will have a run.

DRURY LANE.

Mr Risley—we beg his pardon; we believe he is termed "Professor"—appeared here on Tuesday with his sons, having completed a grand series of continental engagements, extending, as we are informed, to St. Petersburgh. These boys have lost none of that ease and grace which raised their performance so far above any kind of tumbling we had ever before witnessed; and their tours de force elicited the same marks of approbation from the audience as heretofore. Mdlle. Fora Fabbri has been re-engaged, so that these continued attractions will to make a very agreeable programme of entertainments for the Christmas play-goers.

PRINCESS'.

Another "Cricket on the Hearth" made its appearance at this theatre on Thursday evening. This last adaptation is the work of a gentleman named Archer: and he appears to have taken Mr. Albert Smith's Lyceum version for his guide; the action of the drama being the same, as well as several of the descriptive passages worked into the dialogue. The only difference is the manner in which the vision of the fairies is managed, and the introduction of the ... for the effect of the three pages. The cast was distributed as follows:—Dot, Mrs Sterling; John Peerybingle, Mr. Ryder; Caleb Plummer, Mr. Compton; The Stranger, Mr Leigh Murray; Bertha, Miss Marshall. Of these Mrs. Sterling is the most worthy of remark, her acting was gentle and beautifully conceived. Little Miss Marshall proved that she is an excellent an actress as a dancer: her clear fresh voice made every line tell, and her pantomime was most expressive. Of the male characters, Mr. Compton's Caleb was the chief: his performance struck us as being in every respect equal to Keeley's. Mr. Ryder was less happy in his representation of the Carrier. The little part of Tilly Slowboy, which at times comes out so well, was sustained with spirit by Miss Somers

The piece was very nicely mounted—a gauze medium, behind which all the household fairies are seen, contributes much to the effect. The piece was received throughout with tremendous applause; and at the conclusion, all the principal performers were called before the curtain. Its success was complete.

MUSIC.

Not a Concert this week! We breathe again! Save "Maritana" at Drury Lane Theatre, and Mr. Balfe's Entertainment at Covent Garden, pantomime and vaudeville have absorbed the attention of the London amateurs. Next Friday, Handel's "Messiah" will be repeated at Exeter Hall, and on the 15th Mr Horn, the countertenor, announces a "Selection of Sacred Music" to be called "The Lays and Legends of Normandy," assisted by Messrs. Hobbs, Machin, and the Misses M. and A. Williams

Our continental advices record the death of Simon Mayer, the composer, at Bergamo, in Italy, on the 2nd December. He was born in Bavaria, in 1763 and wrote upwards of seventy operas, which had European success until the star of Rossini rose in 1814. Simon Mayer was the master, whom afterwards the master of Donizetti, who succeeded the Swan of Pesaro in popularity. Mayer, in his early career, produced several oratorios and masses, and towards the close of his career, composed an elaborate work upon harmony, which also various instruction and theoretical books. He was Director of the bergamo Academy of Music, and Chapmaster of the church of Maria-Maggiore.

It is now certain that Mendelssohn will conduct the Birmingham Festival, in August next, but it is by no means positive that he will produce his new oratorio on that occasion. There is hope that he will, at length, write a grand opera, as everybody has quitted the field of tragedy. The latter, it is whispered, will now no longer hesitate to bring out one of the great operas he has so long had ready, the representation of which he deferred since Falcon's retirement, because there was then no first-rate "grand actress" called "The Lays and Legends of Normandy," assisted by Messrs. Hobbs, Machin, and the Misses M. and A. Williams

Our continental advices record the death of Simon Mayer, the composer, at Bergamo, in Italy, on the 2nd December. He was born in Bavaria, in 1763 and wrote upwards of seventy operas, which had European success until the star of Rossini rose in 1814. Simon Mayer was the master, whom afterwards the master of Donizetti, who succeeded the Swan of Pesaro in popularity. Mayer, in his early career, produced several oratorios and masses, and towards the close of his career, composed an elaborate work upon harmony, which also various instruction and theoretical books. The "hors" of the forthcoming season are, as yet, expected to be, Hector Barlioz and Franz Liszt, the French can p says: Meyerbeer, the composer and pianist; Dreyschock, the Viennese pianist; and Leopold de Meyer, the American: two pianists from Prague, of German and French fame; Ole Bull, perhaps; Jenny Lind, problematical; Pischek and Staudigl, with Lindpaintner, the composer, certain.

In our notice last week of the Choral Harmonists, we suggested the performance of Beethoven's Second Mass in D. We have been informed that this spirited Society actually has performed this stupendous mass in the season 1839 and 1844. We were not in England on either occasion; but we trust the present season will not pass without a repetition of that great production.

Bologna advices of recent date mention the fact that a new opera is superintending the rehearsals of an opera, composed by Döhler, the celebrated pianist, intended to be produced at the Pergola in Florence. Berlin correspondence announces the great triumphs of an English pianist, named Alcuff, who has been playing in London some eight years since. Liszt has been giving Concerts in the great southern and eastern towns of France, and was to return to Paris for the execution of his Beethoven Cantata.

We cordially agree in the following caution given in last week's Athenæum:—"We should point out and merely the practical inconveniences to the public, but also the disservice to art, arising from the state of a piece from the reports of which artists is to be gathered by such fragmentary power as belongs to the newspaper with the work behind the scenes. That in Paris, the musical journalists are generally at the service of the highest bidder, is a fact of which either critics nor artists make any secret. We are fearful and such anomalous abuses become too rule—not the exception—in England also. Too much has come before us during the last twelvemonth from the case of the shabby bribery down to the odious robbery of private intercourse—not to warrant apprehension. The evil must be obvious to all save to those in whom self-respect falls short, or will, whom impudent rapidity has no limit: and, though such a system (like all systems of corruption) must ultimately destroy itself, we cannot watch its eruption, without anger and indignant protest. Let us hope that every one whom these matters concern—whether it be to artist, who ought also to be a poet, or the merchant of his talent, who can hardly be expected to look beyond his gains—will see cause to discourage a traffic so degrading and ultimately ruinous to art itself."

We have before us two pamphlets—both from the pen of Mr. H. C. Lunn, Associate of the Royal Academy of Music, and published by Addison and Hodson, advocating two startling innovations in music. The first, under the title of "A Brief Exposition of the Sequential System of Musical Notation," sets forth Mr. Lunn's approval of a plan invented by a Mr Armour Walbridge, completely upsetting the Gurdonian system of notation, that has been so long in use and proposing an entire new thing every, divided into two branches, called Musicography, a stenography for composers, and Musicology, a method for general use in performance: and he second work is "A Descriptive Essay on the Patent Clavic Attachment," invented by Mr. G. Brooks, jun., the use of which will facilitate the touching of the violin, tenor, violoncello, contra-basso, and guitar, and will secure, as it is alleged, correct intonation.

We have designated these two publications as "startling;" and, with all due deference to the dictum of Mr Henry Lunn, the Associate, we do think that they might have been given to the world with more influential names as authorities. In respect to Mr Walbridge's full adm ring al the defects and anomalies of the present system of notation, and admiring the ingenuity and intelligence of the inventor, we must confess that we regard his proposed revolution as a mere dream, utterly incapable of realisation, unless we admit the flowing capability of revolutionising the world, for which even Mr. Lunn's certificate will not avail him. As for the Clavic attachment, if half what is promised be performed, the invention will achieve wonders. We have some recollection of having seen a printed fingerboard to place over violins, but the plan of Mr. Brooks, to fix the key-board over the strings of the instrument, the keys of which are to be fitted on the precise spots for producing all the legitimate notes of the gamut, is a novelty. Mr. Lunn asserts that it is adapted for orchestra; but it is well known that there are scarcely two violins alike—the formation of finger-board, nut, or bridge, will make the greatest difference. Hence, an Ernst or a Sivori would fail in playing on an instrument to which they were unaccustomed. We do not see how the violin—the most difficult of all instruments—can be rendered less unattainable by this invention. An exhibition is promised, and we shall be happy to have the opinions of eminent violinists on the subject. Instrumental innovations, unless sustained and recommended by the first-rate authority of practical artists—like the useful transposing pianoforte manufactured by Addison, which has received the universal approval of the profession—must be regarded with suspicion.

THE RAILWAY PROGRESS.

THE NARROW GAUGE.

We have already given an account of some experiments made on the Great Western Railway on the broad gauge

The narrow gauge party on Wednesday conducted their first experiment upon the broad gauge from the Great North of England line between York and Darlington, a distance of forty-five miles, remarkable for its straightness, and the favourable nature of its gradients

Those present were present Professors Barlow and Airey, the commissioners; Mr. Brunel, Mr. Saunders, and Mr. Seymour Clarke, of the broad gauge, and Mr. Hudson, M P., Mr. Bidder, Mr. Gooch, Mr. Cabry, Mr Harrison, Mr. Wyndham Harding, and Mr Barlow of the narrow gauge party The Lord Mayor of York, Mr. J. W. Brook, and others into-ested in the result, were also present. The Great Western party, it will be remembered, ran experimental trips with weights, exclusive of the engine and tender, of 114 tons, 71½ tons, and 61 tons respectively, and with those weights attached the greatest speeds attained were a mile in 61, 58, and 59 seconds. The narrow gauge on Wednesday experimentalised with a train of only 50 tons weight. The engine selected was a new one, built by Mr. Robert Stephenson, with six wheels. The driving wheels 6 feet 6 inches in diameter, were bound; the top of the boiler was about 7 feet 4 inches above the rails, and the cylinders were outside.

All the preliminaries having been arranged, and the carriages, eight in number, having been attached, the train started from the first mile-post at 19 minutes 17 seconds past 8 o'clock, arrived at the 44th mile at 26 minutes 10 seconds past 10, having performed the whole distance of 43 miles in one hour 13 minutes and 53 seconds.

The return trip was made in 1 hour 23 minutes 53 seconds, a delay of some four or five minutes having occurred halfway, in taking in water; and the average speed not being so great as that or the down trip.

The utmost speed attained at any time during the train of only 50 tons, was a mile in 68 seconds, and even that pace was not maintained for above one mile. On the Great Western a speed of one mile in 61 seconds was attained, with a train of 61 tons at starting. In estimation of this disparity in speed, it is only fair to state that a high wind prevailed.

It remains to be seen what the narrow gauge can accomplish on a calm day. Mountains and hills, Mr. Bidder estimated the high wind as an additional weight of 100 tons added to the train. The engine, he said, consumed as much water, generated as much steam, and employed as much power, as had been estimated and expected. He employed on the Great Western, with the 81 ton train, and the superior speed. When the advocates of the narrow gauge were regretting that the wind should have caused them such a retardation, Mr Brunel turned round, and humorously observed, "You can't complain, it's Hudson's fault; he's the fellow that raises the wind."

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

From the Smyrna papers we learn that railways are at present the order of the day in Turkey. Of three projected lines, which should respectively connect the Turkish capital with Smyrna, Varna, and Adrianople, the relative merits are generally discussed. The Impartial newspaper decides in favour of the Smyrna line, on account of the productive provinces through which it would pass, stating, also, that the construction of the nature of the soil are not so great as may be imagined.

A letter from Rome of Dec. 19, says:—"The Pope in separating from the Emperor of Russia for the last time, said, 'I am an old man, who will soon appear before God to give an account of my actions in this world You are young, but you will one day appear there also. I think, I trust that God will enlighten your consciences, and will make you change your conduct with respect to your subjects of the Catholic communion."

Mr. Fox Bell, brother to the President of the United States, is at this moment in Paris. He will remain some time awaiting despatches from Washington, and will then proceed to Rome and Naples, where he will act as Envoy Extraordinary from the Union, in order to exchange the ratifications of a treaty of commerce and amity recently concluded between his Government and the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies.

An Algiers letter of the 20th ult., contradicts the report of the death of Bou-Mara, but states that he has retired in consequence of a quarrel with some of the chiefs of the Flittas, and this, it appears, had led to the report of his having been murdered

It appears by a Vienna letter of the 22nd ult., that the report of the Palace of Duke Ferdinand, of Saxe-Coburg Gotha, in that capital, having been sold to Baron de Rothschild, was unfounded. The property in question is inalienable.

A Swiss journal states that the Government of Lucerne has not only seized on the property of Dr. Steiger, but also on the personal property of Madame Steiger, notwithstanding that the court of law of the district had consented to admit a protest from the latter lady, and that it had proved that Madame Steiger had brought from Fribargh, her birthplace, the furniture of her residence in Lucerne. In addition, Mr. Gilsler, who has been employed for some months in getting in the money due to the doctor, has been arrested.

According to the last accounts from Beyrout the Lebanon was completely disarmed. Some resistance had been made by the Maronites and Reshars, but being summoned to surrender by Namik Pacha, they set the Turkish order at defiance; whereupon, to save effusion of blood, he commanded his troops, instead of firing upon them, to disperse them with the bayonet, an operation which cost only a very few lives

We read from Gotha, in the Frankfurter Journal of the 20th:—"There is much talk here at this moment of a vast financial operation concerning the fruitful property of the Palace Gotha. It has long been a Saxe-Coburg Gotha left a large private fortune, consisting of capi a. placed in foreign funds, particularly in Belgium. His heirs are the reigning Duke and Prince Albert, husband of Queen Victoria. Some time previously to the death of the former, the latter, and immediately complied with by the Duke, this capital is to be withdrawn, and placed out at mortgage at home. According to the present quotations of the public funds, this operation would cause a considerable loss of capital.

The Augsburg Gazette of the 24th states, from Berlin, that the Provincial States of Prussia will certainly be transformed into a States General, and that the first session of this new body will be held in the small town of Schwetz, on the Vistula, in order that its its constitutional deliberations may be carried on without the excitement which might be expected if it were held in the capital

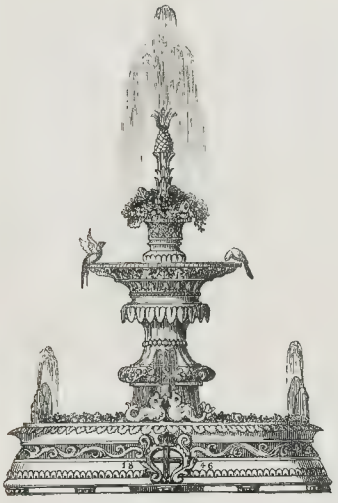
ANCIENT PAINTING DISCOVERED AT CARPENTERS' HALL.

DISCOVERY OF AN ANCIENT PAINTING IN CARPENTERS' HALL.

Several of our old City Halls contain some curious specimens of Decorative Art, which circumstance occasionally brings to light. Thus, a railway has just been the means of revealing a relic of art in the sixteenth century; reminding one of the upturning of the bones of the Conqueror's daughter at Lewes, a few weeks since, by the implement of the railway navigator.

Certain of the City Halls, it should be premised, are not used for civic purposes, owing, sometimes, to the funds of the Companies to which they belong not allowing their maintenance. They are, accordingly, let to tenants for various purposes: for instance, Carpenters' Hall, situate in London-wall, has recently been used as a carpet warehouse; but it is now being fitted up as an office for a railway company. A few days since, a workman employed in the interior, accidentally discovered that a portion of the dais end of the hall had been painted, and he succeeded in removing several coats of plastering so as not to injure the concealed decoration. Some of the Committee of the British Archeological Association next examined this work of ancient art, and considered it so interesting, that they ordered tracings and drawings to be prepared forthwith; Mr. Pocock, the Chairman of the Carpenters' Company, and Mr. Jupp, the clerk, affording every assistance.

The painting is almost three feet in depth, and extends the entire width of the wall. It is divided into four subjects, all bearing allusion to the craft of carpenters. The first represents God ordering Noah to build the ark, and the consequent progress of the work. The second is a group of several figures with a regal personage enthroned, who bears a remarkable resemblance to Henry VIII. An inscription acquaints us that the picture is intended for King Josias ordering the money collected in the Temple to be delivered to the carpenters for repairing the building. The third exhibits Joseph at work at his trade; Mary is seated beside him busily engaged in spinning, and the child Jesus, with a halo round his head, is picking up the chips and putting them into a basket. The fourth subject is Jesus Teaching in the Temple. These paintings are executed in distemper, and are an excellent illustration of this art in the time of Henry VIII., the obvious period of their execution.



THE CITY TWELFTH CAKE.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

COLONEL GURWOOD.

John Gurwood, Esq., Deputy-Governor of the Tower, Colonel in the Army, and Esquire to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington, was born at Hoddesdon, Herts, April 7, 1788, his progenitors having for seven generations resided at Barnby Moor and Langton. Jean de Gorrevod, who served with his cousin, Laurent de Gorrevod, afterwards Comte de Pont de Vaux, under the Duke of Savoy, in fighting against the French at the great Battle of St. Quentin, in 1557, was wounded and conveyed to Calais, then in possession of the English. He escaped from that town previously to its surrender in 1551, and arrived at Kingston-upon-Hull, where he settled and married. From this gentleman Col. Gurwood was eighth in descent.

The gallant Colonel entered the army as Ensign 30th March, 1808, and attained his rank as full Colonel in November, 1841. During the whole of the Peninsular War he was engaged under the Duke of Wellington, and participated in the Storming of Ciudad Rodrigo, and Fort Renaud; in the Battles of Vittoria, Salamanca, Nivelle, Nive, Orthes, and Toulouse. At Ciudad Rodrigo he led the successful Forlorn Hope, and, in remembrance of his gallantry, he bore on his coat of arms, as an honourable augmentation, the shield of the town, with the sword of the Governor, whom he took prisoner. Col. Gurwood served subsequently through the campaign of 1815, and was severely wounded at Waterloo. On that memorable occasion he was on the Staff of the Commander-in-Chief, and filled the important office of Private Secretary to his Grace, a position which afforded him peculiar facilities for editing the "Wellington Despatches," a work of national importance, with which his name will be handed down to posterity. The lamentable termination of Col. Gurwood's life is detailed in another part of our paper. We will here merely add that, in consequence of a lowness and despondency of spirits, his medical attendant had, about a month since, ordered the Colonel to try the bracing air of Brighton, and that, while there, in a fit of temporary insanity, he put an end to his existence on Saturday last.

THE EARL OF BELMORE.

Somerset Lowry Corry, Earl of Belmore, died on the 17th December, aged 71. This Nobleman was the only child, by his first wife, of Armar Lowry, Esq., M.P. for the County of Tyrone, (the representative of an eminent and opulent family in the North of Ireland), who assumed, as heir to the estates of his maternal ancestors, the surname and arms of Corry, and was created Baron Belmore in 1781. He became subsequently Viscount Belmore, and finally obtained an Earldom in 1797.

The late Peer, who was one of the Representative Lords, and who filled at one time the influential appointment of Governor-General of Jamaica, married, 20th Oct., 1800, Juliana, second daughter of Henry Thomas, second Earl of Carrick, and has left two sons—Armar, Viscount Corry, now Earl of Belmore; and the Right Hon. Henry Thomas Corry, M.P. for Tyrone.

The League Meeting at Manchester.—The total amount subscribed in consequence of the recent Anti-Corn-law meeting at Manchester was £71,773. Among the subscriptions on the first day were:—One of £1,500, twenty-four of £1000, one of £700, twenty-five of £500, four of £400, seven of £300, twenty-eight of £250, seventeen of £200, nine of £150, one of £125, seventy of £100; it was in one week only from its commencement, that the subscription reached the amount of £71,773; averaging more than £10,000 daily.

THE CITY TWELFTH CAKE.

A gratifying evidence of the progress art is making among us is the growing attention manufacturers now bestow on the artistic decoration of even such wares as used to be considered unworthy of any but the rudest ornament. Even the time-honoured monstrosities in chalk, and barbarisms in orange-peel, that have gladdened the hearts of countless juveniles, on the twelfth-cakes of by-gone days, have, at length, given place to the fanciful creations of a higher taste. As an example, we take the above beautiful design, which is now displayed in the shop-window of Messrs. Batger & Co., of Bishopsgate-street. The circumference of this monstrous cake is 8 feet 6 inches, its height 4 feet 8½ inches, and its total weight upwards of a hundred-weight; but the various parts are in such good proportion that it does not strike one at first as being nearly so large. The cake itself forms a plateau, from which rises an elegant tazza, having in its centre a vase of flowers, and a pine-apple, from among the leaves of which a fountain springs in the most graceful form of apparently falling water. The whole structure is elaborately ornamented with flowers and the delicacies of confectionary; birds of sponge-cake dip their beaks in basins of translucent sugar-candy, and blanc-mange dolphins continually spout forth streams of almost irresistible barley-sugar. It is a new sign of the times, when an eminent R.A. condescends to the production of a design for a twelfth-cake; yet so it really is in this instance, and the result is a work of pure art and undeniable taste.

WASSAIL BOWL IN GLOUCESTERSHIRE.

We have been favoured by a Correspondent with a sketch of a relic of the ancient custom of Wassailing, which is still kept up in some parts of Gloucestershire.

During the Christmas week bands of men, calling themselves "Wassailers," carry about, at night time, a large bowl made from the wood of the Apple-tree; and sing a song and chorus before the doors of their neighbours. Two pieces of stick are generally bent crossways over the bowl: these, as well as the bowl, are ornamented with Laurel, Mistletoe, various other evergreens, gay ribbons, &c. At the conclusion of the song, the bowl is sent into the house for inspection, in the hope that it may be returned well filled with beer, &c., or accompanied by some trifling pecuniary donation.

THE ENGLISH TOM THUMB.

The American General has left the Metropolis, and has been succeeded by "the Miniature John Bull," or, as he has been re-christened—"the English Tom Thumb." The certificate of his birth proves him to be 15 years of age, though he resembles a child of four: he was born at Kitstafield, near Wellington, as we lately stated.

THE ENGLISH TOM THUMB.

Our little new comer is located at the Gallery of British Artists, in Suffolk-street; where he enacts various performances; introducing songs, pantomimic feats, &c., to the delight of admiring audiences. A spirited portrait of this new Lilliputian has just been published by Mr. Moore, of West-street, St. Martin's Lane.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

SOPWELL NUNNERY.

This interesting relic of monastic times occupies a considerable space of ground about half a mile south-eastward of St. Alban's; but, the dilapidations have been so great of late years, that neither the plan of the buildings, nor their appropriation can now be traced. This Nunnery was of the Benedictine order, and was founded about 1140, by Geoffrey de Gorman, 16th Abbot of St. Alban's, on the site of an humble dwelling that had been constructed of tress, by two pious women, who lived here in seclusion and strict abstinence. The Abbot ordained that the number of nuns should not exceed thirteen, and that none should be admitted into the sisterhood but maidens. He also granted them some lands, and their possessions were afterwards increased by different grants from Henry de Albini, and others of his family. An estate in the parish of Ridge was likewise given to them by Richard de Tany, or Todeni. At the period of the dissolution of this house, its annual revenues were estimated, according to Speed, at £68 8s.; Tanner estimated them at £98 8s.; and Dugdale records them at only £40 7s. 10d.

In the year 1541 Henry VIII. granted the site and building of the Nunnery to Sir Richard Lee, who had been bred to arms, and was the person who had previously obtained the grant of the lands lying contiguous to the Abbey Church. According to Newcome, Sir Richard was indebted for Sopwell to the solicitations of his handsome wife, whose maiden name was Margaret Greenfield, and who was in no small favour with the King.

By Sir Richard the buildings were enlarged and altered for his own residence: and the surrounding grounds were enclosed by a wall, and converted into a park. He died, 1575, leaving two daughters. By Anne, the eldest of whom married to Edward Sadlier, second son of Sir Ralph Sadlier, of Standon, in the same county, Sopwell passed into that family. About the time of the Restoration, it again fell to an heiress, married to Thomas Saunders Esq., of Beechwood, and was afterwards sold to Sir Harbottle Grimston, an ancestor of the present Earl of Verulam, of Gorhambury, who is now the owner of this property.

The ruins of Sopwell are mostly huge fragments of wall, composed of flint and brick. The windows in what appear to have been the principal apartments, are square and large, with stone frames; some of which have been ornamented. In the gardens, which lie contiguous, over the door leading into the principal one, is a square tablet of stone, sculptured with the figure of a dexter hand and arm, elevated, and holding a broken sword; above was an inscribed label, but now unintelligible. The crest g ranted to Sir Richard Lee was very similar.

SOPWELL NUNNERY.

In an angle in the garden is a strongly arched brick building, with various small recesses and niches constructed within the walls. This Nunnery is said to have obtained the name of Sopwell from the circumstance of the two women who first established themselves here sopping their crusts in the water of a neighbouring well. One of the out-buildings is yet standing at a little distance, and is now used as a barn. Many of those who assumed the veil at Sopwell were ladies of distinguished rank, family, and learning. It has been said that Henry VIII. was privately married to Ann Boleyn in the Chapel here.

Some of the greatest interest and value have been found here at various times, and it is a spot well worthy the inspection of the antiquary and the curious being situate within an easy and pleasant walk of the ancient town of St. Alban.

ABBERLEY HALL, WORCESTERSHIRE.

DESTRUCTION OF ABBERLEY HALL BY FIRE.

We regret to record the burning of the fine old mansion of Abberley Hall, near Witley, and about five miles from Stourport, in Worcestershire. The house was finely situate in the midst of a plantation, on the top of a high hill. It was occupied at the time of the fire by Mrs. Moilliett, widow of the late Mr. J. S. Moilliett, by whom some very extensive additions and improvements had been made to the property, amongst which was the erection of a high tower, which overlooked the country for many miles. These improvements had hardly been completed when Mr. Moilliett died, and now nearly the whole has been destroyed by fire.

The fire commenced at about three o'clock in the afternoon of Christmas Day. Shortly before that time a servant had been into a store-room at the top of the house, to procure some fruit, &c., for the family dinner; and had taken a lighted candle with her, the room being dark; when the other servants returned from church, in about a quarter of an hour after, they observed smoke issuing from the store-room, and thus the fire was discovered. An alarm was instantly raised, and the neighbours and servants from the different gentlemen's seats and farm-houses in the neighbourhood promptly rendered assistance: among these the servants of Her Majesty the Queen Dowager, from Witley Court, were very active and useful. The Rev J. R. Wood, Canon of Worcester Cathedral and Chaplain to the Queen Dowager, was also on the spot, he having been at the time on a visit at Witley Court.

In consequence, however, of the difficulty of finding water in such an elevated situation as that on which the house stood, and the fire raging at the very top of the mansion, all efforts to save the building proved fruitless; a great deal of very valuable furniture, however, was saved, by the exertions of the people, and also some of the fittings, which were of a most costly description. The principal rooms were decorated with great taste; but the whole is completely destroyed, nothing being now left of this once beautiful residence but the bare and blackened walls.

Mrs. Moilliett, the owner of the property, was, at the outbreak of the fire, lying upon a bed of sickness, where she had been confined for several weeks past. She was removed, with her family of four children, to the Hundred House, a large inn near. The damage to the building is estimated at about £4000; but the value of the furniture, &c., lost is not estimated. The property was insured for some £4000.

Fire-engines were (on the alarm being given) despatched from Witley Court, and from Stourport, but, owing to the want of water, from the cause already stated, they were comparatively inefficient. Happily, the fire taking place in the day-time, no loss of life occurred.

WRECK OF THE "TWA CORNEILSSON" DUTCH EAST INDIAMAN.

(From a Correspondent.)

On Sunday morning last, at about two o'clock, the Preventive Coast-Guard officers on duty, opposite No. 55 Martello Tower, near the Sluice, in Pevensey Bay, were appraised of some ship being in distress, and requiring aid from the shore, by hearing, at short intervals, the firing of large guns at sea. The excessive darkness and rough state of the weather, however, made it impossible for the officers to open any communication with the doomed ship. Many and sad were the conjectures, as to who and what the vessel could be, and this dreadful suspense was kept for several hours; till the daylight allowed the officers to ascertain her position, and the crew, their distance from the shore.

She proved to be a large, full-rigged ship, with her bows inclining to the shore westward; the waves were dashing over her with great fury, making a breach across her decks between her main and foremasts, and driving the crew into the mizen-top, where they had considerable difficulty in transferring a sick soldier. After daylight, the Captain, Forcumvek, and part of the crew, reached land in the long boat, but were unable to return for their anxious messmates, on account of the roughness of the sea and the strong gale from the west.

About half past ten, the life-boat from Eastbourne was seen coming gallantly before the wind, down to their assistance, manned with a hardy and experienced crew of fishermen appointed for such occasions. She came round the stern, taking a rope thrown from the rigging, and bringing up to the starboard of the wreck with the rope fixed to the mizen yard-arm, and the front of the life-boat; the men then got from the top, on the yard, and all slid down by the rope, except the boy and sick soldier. The former got half way down, where he remained for some time, unable to proceed, the anxious spectators momentarily expecting he would drop into the boiling surf beneath him. He, at last, succeeded in reaching the boat; not so fortunate was the poor soldier, who, being unable to stand, from the exposure and fatigue, had been lashed to the rigging, in which position he was found lifeless by a party of Preventive men, who went to his assistance in the afternoon, when the wind was considerably calmer. The crew, consisting of twenty-six seamen, one boy, and three soldiers, were taken to the Inn, in the neighbourhood.

It appeared that they made the different lights correctly along the coast, including Beachy Head, when they signalled for a pilot and lay to for morning; but, from ignorance of their position, they got in too close on the shore, and struck about a quarter of a mile below low water mark; at eleven (high water), it reached about half way between the deck and main-yard; the ship rolled and strained terribly, and fears were entertained whether she would hold together. Thomas Pierce, and two or three hardy fellows, remained for a considerable time, at the peril of their own lives, to be in readiness to render assistance, in case of the masts falling: although they were unable to approach sufficiently near to take any off the wreck, on account of the fruitless of their boat. On Monday morning all the masts had given way, and the hull fast yielded to the constant strain of the waves. The rough weather on Tuesday completed the wreck. She was bound from Batavia for Amsterdam, 92 days at sea, and was a fine copper-bottomed ship of about 800 tons, and heavily laden with coffee, indigo, and sugar.

It may be interesting to add that the life-boat by which the crew were saved was built some years since at the expense of the late benevolent John Fuller, Esq., of Rose Hill; he had heard of the want of such a provision on this part of the Sussex coast, and he afterwards took much interest in having the boat well exercised.

WRECK OF A DUTCH INDIAMAN, PEVENSEY BAY.

ELECTION FOR THE WEST RIDING OF YORKSHIRE.—It is said that George Lane Fox, Esq., of Bramham Park, is likely to be the Conservative candidate for the West Riding of Yorkshire, in opposition to Lord Morpeth. Mr. Fox is a great favourite with a majority of the electors. Lord Morpeth has issued an address in which he states his determination to support a total repeal of the Corn-laws.

A letter from Van Diemen's Land states that Geach, the expatriated solicitor, was in July last keeping a school in a small cottage at Hobart Town. Frost was actively employed as a clerk in the same town, and Jones had left off driving a stage coach, and was then engaged at his trade of watchmaker.

LITERATURE.

ALMANACKS, &c., FOR 1846.—The Post Office Directory, in its 47th annual edition, is the most complete work of its class ever published: it certainly presents the best digest of Postal matters extant: it is, besides, the only volume which has ever included a Street Directory of London, showing at one view all the inhabitants of each street or place.—The Banking Almanac and Directory contains every kind of information on Banking Business; list, tables new laws, &c.—The Engineers' Steel Almanac, by Jabez Bates, is illustrated with a framework of new machines; the tables of steam, the method of working, too, will prove very useful.—The Art-Union of London Almanac contains a list of the Provincial Hon. Secretaries to the parent Society, and a variety of information peculiarly acceptable to Artists and Art-Union subscribers.—Bradshaw's Railway Almanac appears in "Vates," bears complete lists of "non-inations, winners, performances, &c.; besides a sporting Calendar; an effective Engraving of "The Baron" winning the Great St. Leger; and a comic effusion—"Railway Staggers," by the Editor.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

"The King, who was exce sively affected to hunting and the m-rits of the field, had a great desire to make a great park red as well as fallow deer between Richmond and Hampton Court." Clarendon.

"Circumstances govern cases," saith the proverb; and, if we sought for the climate of the action, the operations of the chase would be found to be confined, the virtue of the wild man, is the vice of civilisation. The respectable savage goes forth to kill him venison for the necessities of his desert household: Nature points to the quarry upon which philosophical reasoning urges him. Presently comes the era of butchers' meat: the epoch of bread and butter. The sons of the wilderness have gathered together into a nation: they have set them up kings and Princes, and in the assertion of their sovereignty, they have found those who se forefathers hunted to live now live to hunt: the chase becomes a necessity of life instead of the means of its supply. At what period the appropriation of wild animals led its origin no one can tell. "The date," says a late writer upon the subject, "is lost in the mists of antiquity."

We read of the Forest-laws in the Psalms; and, in the History of Greece, that Philip of Macedon "had forest hunting laws, for cases of delict and punishment of Cæsar does not tell us how he found the Game-laws, on the occasion of his visit: but they must have been in a bad state when Canute arrived, for, no sooner had the Crown fallen into his hands, than he called a council of the wise men to talk about their revision. Antecedent to the reign of the Dane, all the wild beasts and birds of these islands were the exclusive property of the Sovereign: Canute, however, gave every freeborn man the right to take such animals as were found with on his own fields, provided they were not within his (the King's) chase. Edward the Confessor confirmed this privilege, adding, as a rider, that if man did not refrain from trespass on the hunting grounds, being deprived, it should be at the "loss of life:" which were strinrent terms on the part of "the Saint." In the following reigns we read that the people grumbled considerably at the pressure of forest legislation—for their pastures and gardens of their lands were devoured by the wild beasts of the King, without any recompense."

In those three last words lay and still lies the opprobrium of the Game-laws. They contain both the principle of the evil and the principle of its remedy. Let the cannot see wherefore he may not feed upon the coney that feeds upon his cabbages. He is told, indeed, that if timber trespass upon his neighbour's land he may straighway proceed to impound them for the damage; but he is either too chimsy to catch the transgressor, or too full to take the joke. How the pauperised makers have so long submitted to it to escape them is unaccountable. Colm Clout detests an epicurean leverel devouring his parsley without invitation, and he retaliates, and takes the debt out in kind. He thinks it all right, and his neighbours concur in his views: but the 1 and 2 Will. IV., c. 32, is of a different way of thinking, and the consequence of the discrepancy of opinion is that our swaun goes to prison.

In spite of all the proofs he has had to the contrary, your rural reasoner will confound law and justice together; without knowing why, he takes them for synonymous terms. You would suppose a couple of months in the county gaol might help him to a different conclusion; but though, perhaps, he has his doubts when under lock and key, the breath of his native fields dispels his scruples, and he returns to his faith in the chivalry of the Statute at Large, and his practice of knocking miscellaneous young deers on the head. He returns to his practical experiments in justice, we say, and, after the usual course of quarter sessions and bridewell, he finally settles down with his philosophy in Norfolk Island.

It is not in wantonness we thus deal with a matter which stands so prominently a reproach upon our system of field sports. We thus seek to enveile attention to an unpalatable subject, in the hope of inducing a remedy by general justice. Public opinion insists upon some reform of the existing Game Laws: the call cannot—ought not to be neg-cted. In many districts our preservation is a great moral grievance, as well as a great polychemical nuisance. And why should it exist when there is a remedy—of which no honest man dare announce himself the opponent? Let the game preserver pay for the support of his stock of the privileged class as well as of that of his four-footed and feathered foes. I leave to a Committee of Parliament the arrangement of the machinery; but, let the principle of this reform be the payment, on a liberal scale, of all damage, of whatever kind, done by game, by the party assuming a property in, or a right to it.

This argumentum ad arcum will be found a heavy blow for the baton people. Few of the mightiest of Nimrods would relish paying a thousand pounds a season for the foxy chase of pheasants, and four times that sum for the use of a board and lodging. These hints become the season in which they are put forth —the spirit in which they are offered, is one of a like good will towards all whom they affect.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—A slight improvement in Sting, and a strong disposition to invest on Fancy Boy, were the only items of a very dull afternoon. To make a book of this description would be absurd; we shall, therefore, confine ourselves to the actual bets:—

CHESTER CUP.—1000 to 20 agst Alice Hawthorn, and 2000 to 30 agst My Mary

DERBY.—60 to 1 20 agst Sting, 2000 to 50 agst Humdrum; 600 to 15 agst Fancy Boy, 1000 to 20 agst Wet Counsel, and 1000 to 20 agst Sharpshin.

OAKS.—90 to 10 agst Forde's ot.

THURSDAY.—The wind-up of the Old Year was lively compared with the opening of the New: not above a dozen of the fraternity having attended the room. The only bets were 15 to 1 agst Brocade, to £40; 1000 to 30 agst Fancy Boy; 750 to 25 agst Spitwad; 625 to 25 agst Osprey; and £750 to 25 agst Sister to Flambeau. No improvement can be expected before the Meeting of Parliament.

VICTORIA PARK.—In consequence of the very propitious state of the weather, the operations of digging and planting have been very actively resumed, and from seventy to eighty men are daily employed in these occupations. Within the last month upwards of 2000 trees and shrubs have been planted, the avenues being lined with elms and horsdesens, interm xed with laurels, chesnuts, and the true cock-spur thorn. Since the removal of the Three Colts public-house, which formed the Grove-gate entrance, a fine extensive view has been thrown open from the upper parts of the park to Temple Mills, and the adjacent districts in Essex. Great activity is being exercised by building speculators in the vicinity, and some very handsome and extensive ranges have been erected in the Bishop's-road, adjacent to the new Bethnal green workhouse.

THE BRITISH MUSEUM.—The British Museum closed on Wednesday for the annual recess, and will not re-open to the public till Friday next, the 2nd inst.

THE NEW PLANET—ALTONA, Dec. 23.—The following extract of a letter from Professor Schumacher will be read with interest by astronomers:—"Mr Encke obtained an observation of the 4th of December, and this observation has given an approximate sketch of the orbit of the new planet. I send you the elements: Epoch of mean longitude, 1846, Jan 0, at 0 hour, 89 degrees, 32 minutes, 14 seconds 1-10th; longitude of perihelion, 247 degrees, 4 minutes, 30 seconds; longitude of ascending node, 119 degrees, 44 minutes, 37 seconds 5-10ths; inclination, 7 degrees, 43 minutes, 8 seconds 4-10ths; excentricity, 0·0079981; logarithm of semiaxis major, 0·431961; daily mean motion, 827 seconds 65-100ths; periodic time, 1565 days. The discoverer has left the determination of the name to Mr Encke, and Mr Encke calls it 'Astræa.'"

SUDDEN DEATH IN A BARN.—On Wednesday evening, Mr. Bedford held an inquest at the Black Horse, Bedfordbury, on the body of Thomas Scantlebury, aged 41, late stud groom to Mr. Tattersall, of Hyde-park-corner. The deceased had complained of a severe pain in the region of the heart for some months past, and, on Sunday morning, he got into an omnibus in Cheapside, to go to St George's Hospital. On the arrival of the vehicle at Charing-cross, he suddenly fell from the seat of the carriage. He was immediately carried out to an insensible state, and taken to the Charing-cross Hospital, but life was quite extinct prior to his arrival. Dr. Golding attributed his death to the sudden rupture of a blood-vessel of the heart. Verdict—Natural death

ST. PANCRAS' BATHS AND WASHHOUSES.

This establishment owes its origin to the formation of a society within the present year for providing the labouring classes of the parish of St. Pancras with Baths and Wash-houses. Of the probable or certain effects of erecting such establishments throughout London there may be different opinions, as there always are in reference to novel or untried experiments. The St. Pancras Society, however, have strong reasons to believe that the objections that were at first raised against such projects are, not only in their own parish, but elsewhere, fast yielding to the facts and arguments which have been brought to bear upon the subject; especially those which have been derived from the reports of the Liverpool Corporation establishment, showing on the one hand that it is conferring direct and immediate benefit upon those for whom it is intended; and, that they, on the other, are desirous of enjoying it. Indeed, it is hard to understand upon what ground the use of the bath, which is so much lauded amongst the rich, can longer be denied to the poor, whose constant toil not only renders it to them a source of greater luxury, but more absolutely essential to their health; for who that knows anything at all of the important and continually employed functions of the skin but will admit that frequent ablution is one of the surest modes by which its healthy action may be preserved, and the entire body thereby rendered less susceptible of ailment or disease, and that to its clogged and filthy condition may be attributed, and is very often traced, a considerable portion of those complaints from which so many poor people are continually seeking relief at hospitals, dispensaries, and medical shops? Between the physical constitution of the two classes, there is not that wide difference which would make the frequent use of baths salutary for the rich and hurtful to the poor; while there is that deep disparity between their respective positions in the world, and their means, which makes it the more incumbent on those who have time and wealth at their command to consider the subject in al. its bearings, and than to aid, by their personal activity, as well as their purse, in carrying out the objects of the St. Pancras Society, if they should see in the attainment of those objects increased cleanliness and comfort to the labouring classes of London, and a consequent increase in the congregations of metropolitan churches, from which it is well known that numbers are kept away rather by an inability to make a decent appearance than by inclination. The buildings of the St. Pancras Establishment are now in course of creation. The site is peculiarly favourable, being the vacant ground at the base of the reservoir in the Hampstead-road, which the New River Company have with much liberality given to the society at a nominal rental, accompanying the gift, for so it may be called, with an offer to supply them with fresh spring water, raised from a depth of 200 feet below the surface of the earth, free of expense for the first s x months, and at the lowest possible cost subsequently to that period. The possession of such a site, upon terms so favourable, the fact of its being situated in a densely populated, though not very poor district (including Camden-town, Somers-town, Henry-street, Hampstead-road, Fitzroy and Mortimer-markets), the certainty of a constant supply of pure water, and the pecuniary support of several noble influential persons in the parish, are circumstances which afford a very fair prospect of early, if not immediate success.

ENTRANCE TO THE BATHS AND WASHHOUSES.

The establishment consists of a range of building, averaging about 12 feet in width, and 800 in extent. It forms nearly three sides of a square, the entrance (by George-street) being in the centre. To the left of the receiving-room, which is placed in a direct line from the entrance, at the end of a passage containing 5 vapour-baths, are 22 small compartments for men's baths (cold, warm, or shower, at the option of the bather), 6 of which will be at a cost of one penny, 6 at twopence, and 10 (superiorly fitted up), for a higherclass of persons and reached by a separate door), at sixpence; double those prices being charged when hot water is made use of. At the end of these will be two large plunge, or swimming-baths, 60 feet by 21, at twopence and sixpence, with separate approaches. This completes the left wing of the premises. To the right of the receiving-room, and arranged on the same plan, will be 16 baths for women, 8 of them being fitted up in a superior style. Beyond these, and to which there is a distinct entrance, without passing through the bath-room, is the washing department, which will contain 64 double tubs, the larger portion for washing in, the smaller to be made to answer the purpose of a copper, by a jet of steam which will keep the water in a boiling state. Each woman will be separated from her neighbour by a wooden partition, and need not even turn round until her work is completed, as there is a ledge in front of the tub expressly for placing the things on according as she washes them. That being done she may put them into a patent drying machine (a model of which may be seen at the Polytechnic Institution), and with muchless injury to them effect what is now done by the process called 'wringing.' In the next room there is another machine, by means of which hot air is blown into a tube running underneath a range of closets, with a valve for each, that may be closed or opened at pleasure; and, by hanging the clothes in one of these closets, and opening a valve, they, in a very short time, will be fit for the iron or the mangle, both of which will be provided in additional rooms, already built for the purpose. For all this accommodation each person is only to be charged 1d., if she does not stay more than two hours at the tube, and one hour more in the drying and ironing rooms

We can only add our sincere anxiety for the success of the establishment; fraught as the plan is with the best means of aiding and improving the health and comfort of the industrious classes.

A Moveable Railway.—A moveable railway is reported to have been lately invented. M. Roemler, of Weimar, and M. Hermann, of Erfurt, two young mechanics, exhibited before the members of the Polytechnic Society of Berlin, a carriage with coherent rails, their own invention. This carriage, or diligence, is provided with two series of rails, one on each side, and which, by some simple mechanism, move so that one of them is always under the wheels. Though the coach cannot run with the speed of a railway carriage, it can proceed twice as fast as other carriages on common roads and may be employed where the gradients are strong. It may be drawn not only by an engine, but by horses. A patent for this invention has been obtained in Prussia and Saxe-Weimar.

Constantinople letters of the 8th ult., announce that the committee to which the Divan had referred the examination of the claims of British subjects in Tripoli, had terminated its labours, and that there was every prospect that the long-pending negociation on the subject between the Porte and the British Ambassador would give rise to no fresh complication.

THE MILITIA.

It is generally reported, and the rumour, we believe, is well founded, that one of the first measures of the next session will be an act for calling out and embodying the Militia of the United Kingdom. The Government is, doubtless, prepared to give its reasons for this step, but, we confess, they do not stand out very prominently to the ordinary observer. Neither "malice domestic" nor "foreign levy" threaten us with danger. The people are quiet in their habits, and industrious; too busy to rebel or to think of rebelling. Except in Ireland, an armed force is not yet reckoned among the ordinary means of administering the affairs of the Kingdom. Foreign invasion is talked of occasionally, as a possibility, much in the manner that the schoolmen of old treated the most extraordinary themes as exercises of the logical power in discussion and debate; but no reasonable man has any apprehension of the contingency as an actual event. By a remarkable coincidence, the alarmists in France insist on the ease with which England could invade Gaul, while here wonderful pains are taken to show with how little effort France could invade England. In both countries it is a cry got up to answer a purpose, and the clamour is of a kind which all who can see that purpose, can afford to despise.

In France, the Government is frightened into building forts, arming batteries, and increasing its navy, by exaggerated statements of the activity shown in these matters by "perfidious Albion." Here the same game is played, with the same result. The activity of France is pointed out, and it is insisted we ought to keep ahead of our rival; and so we spend millions in building ships we do not want, and constructing batteries which we hope will never be needed, merely because our neighbours are doing so. Two great nations drive each other along in a continual race of absurdity. The last proceeding of the French Chamber, we see is a vote of increased credit to the Minister of Marine for an addition to the French navy, though France has no colonies, and not commerce enough to occupy one-half her present naval force in defending it. And this expense is incurred, too, with a revenue notoriously unequal to the current and legitimate expenditure of the State. That we may not be behind hand in national folly, we are about to take a step equally needless—the Government is going to call out the Militia!

And when it is called out, what will it have to do? is the question everybody will naturally ask. We know all the flourishes that can be, as they have been, made about the defence of the country being best entrusted to its citizens, and various other forms of the same idea. But who is attacking the country, that a defence of it is needed? And if it was attacked, we are prepared to join issue with the maxim altogether, and deny that the citizens of a country are the best able to defend it from assault. Why they are not the best defence of nations is obvious; war is a profession as strictly technical as any other, and the business of a soldier requires the training of a life. The habits, pursuits, and modes of thought in which the citizen grows up unfits him for the camp and field; it is the tendency of civilisation to divide the employments of men into distinct classes; and, by so doing, each attains a perfect mastery over that upon which he is thrown.

It is only in the early History of States that we read of the citizen converted into the soldier, and the soldier becoming the citizen, with facility to himself and advantage to the community. It has been found better to establish a military class, honourable in rank, paid fairly, and with whom all the engagements made by the Government must be performed by the people with the most scrupulous exactness. Always ready for action, such an instrument is the best calculated to meet sudden emergencies. The jealousy with which a standing army was once regarded has died away before the many proofs we have had of its advantages, and the impossibility of its strength being perverted for political ends, in a Constitutional Government, through which the people have the complete control of it. The superiority of a regular army consists in this—that the professional soldier has no divided interest; all his hopes and prospects are bound up with his military career, which presents to him success or failure, honour or disgrace, according to his conduct in it. The citizen soldier will always regard his military service as the least important of his duties—to be shuffled off, and escaped from, or performed with as little inconvenience to his other interests as possible.

A task that is forced on men is always an unwelcome one; we know men are bound to defend their country, and they will do so when they see the necessity for it; but they will not be patriotic by order of the Horse Guards, when no danger is visible or probable. Without a total change in our social system, and one we should be sorry to see, the English people can never become what is called a military one; they have all the qualities that make good soldiers, but do not exhibit them without long training. The defence of the country must always depend on our regular land and sea forces; and if they are vanquished, and the foot of the invader really presses our soil, then the conflict must take the form of a popular war; from this contingency, if a thing so dreadful be possible, no Militia could save us: the mass of the population must remain unmilitary, and by the mass of the population, in such a desperate case, the national defence must be made. Look at that most military nation Prussia, where part of every man's life is passed in the army, with no exceptions; the partial training fails to make real soldiers of them; no nation of Europe was so quickly or easily conquered by the veterans of Napoleon as this, where everything is sacrificed to military organisation. There, the Militia system—the blending of the citizen and the soldier—is perfect, yet it failed, as it would fail again in real conflict. The French are naturally a martial people; her army is the finest in the world take it altogether; but the National Guard, the Militia, is everywhere the object of ridicule.

The calling out of the Militia here is only an indirect way of adding to the strength of the army; we dislike all pretexts when they are only disguises for other objects. If our colonies absorb too many of our regular forces—if they cannot be relieved often enough—if, whether at home or abroad, more men are wanted—let them be asked for and obtained, and honestly paid and clothed, and offered by an estimate for that purpose. Calling out the Militia will only take men from their business who cannot neglect it, or throw on them the expence of finding a substitute, which, as thousands will have to do it, will amount to a tax on a part of the community, for the benefit of the whole—a direct piece of injustice.

We see that every "encouragement" is to be given to men, after the Militia is embodied, to volunteer into the line. This confirms our belief that an augmentation of the regular army is the real object in view. Why not do this openly, and at once, by fair pay, sufficient bounty, a pension liberal enough to assure a man of the means of life after years of service, and, above all, such a relaxation of the rules of promotion as should induce a better class of men to enter the army as a profession? The nation would not object to this; but it will object to having its pursuits disturbed, and a tax thrown upon individuals under the pretence of embodying the Militia, which is not wanted, really to add to the numbers of the regular army, an addition which we do not doubt is really required.

PRESENTATION OF ADDRESSES TO HER MAJESTY FROM THE LORD MAYOR AND CORPORATION OF LONDON, AND FROM THE LORD MAYOR AND CORPORATION OF DUBLIN.

Last Saturday afternoon the Queen held a Court at Windsor Castle, for the reception, on the Throne, of Addresses from the Corporations of the Cities of London and Dublin

At a quarter-past two o'clock the Lord Mayor and Corporation of London arrived at the Castle, having travelled from town by the Great Western Railway. The City procession was preceded by the City Marshals on horseback; the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs came with their state equipages, and the other members of the Corporation occupied numerous carriages. The deputation consisted of the Lord Mayor, 7 Aldermen, 2 Sheriffs, 110 Common Councilmen, and the City officers.

The Aldermen present were Humphery, Hooper, Sir George Carroll, William Hunter, Wood, Hughes Hughes, and Sidney; the Sheriffs, Messrs. Chaplin and Laurie.

The Lord Mayor was attended by his chaplain, the Rev. Mr. Farebrother, and the Sword-bearer and Mace-bearer. His Lordship wore his gold collar over his state robes, and all the members of the deputation were their respective robes.

The Corporation alighted at the State Entrance, and passed up the Grand Staircase.

The State apartments had been prepared for the reception of the Corporations. The Addresses were received in the Throne, or Garter Room

The Corporation of London were received, on their arrival, in St. George's Hall, and were conducted to the Waterloo Chamber, where a most sumptuous collation was served on a long range of tables, extending round the sides, and covered with the greatest variety of refreshments and delicacies. The centre of each table was elegantly ornamented with handsome silver vases richly chased, and a number of ornamental designs. The Queen's Pages attended at the tables on the guests, including the whole of the Corporation and officers, supplying the numerous party with champagne and other choice wines.

On leaving the Waterloo Chamber, the Corporation re-entered St. George's Hall.

Her Majesty being seated on the Throne, Sir William Martins and the Hon. Frederick Byng, the Gentlemen Ushers in Waiting, ushered the Lord Mayor and deputation into the Grand Reception or Ball Room (fitted up in the gorgeous style of Louis Quatorze). At the door of the Throne Room the Corporation were met by the Vice-Chamberlain, who conducted them to the presence of her Majesty.

The Recorder then read the following address:—

"Most Gracious Sovereign,—We, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London, in Common Council assembled, humbly approach your Royal person, respectfully to represent to your Majesty.

"That great, powerful, and wealthy as this nation is, by far the largest portion of your Majesty's subjects in Ireland, and a great portion of your Majesty's subjects in England, Scotland, and Wales, have long been reduced, for their principal food, to potatoes.

"That all classes, but especially the poor, have been, and are, great sufferers from the result of the natural economy.

"That the blight which has fallen upon the potato has subjected your Majesty's people to great anxiety and distress, and to the danger of famine.

"That their sufferings are attributable to erroneous legislation, which, by excluding the importation of food, and restricting commerce, shuts out from the nation the bounty of Providence. We therefore humbly pray that your Majesty will be graciously pleased to use the means in your Majesty's power to open the ports of this kingdom for the free importation of food."

Her Majesty, having received the Address, was pleased to return the following most gracious answer:

"The motives which have induced you to present this address are duly appreciated by me. The wants and sufferings of my people at all times command my warmest sympathy; and I deeply regret the failure in the present year of a full supply of an article of food on which so many of my subjects are accustomed to subsist.

"I have directed Parliament to assemble on an early day, and I shall gladly sanction any measure which the wisdom of the Legislature may suggest, as conducive to the alleviation of this temporary distress, and to the permanent welfare of all classes of my people."

The Lord Mayor and the Senior Alderman, Mr. Humphery, had the honour to kiss Lands. Mr. David Williams Wire, the mover, and Mr William Johnson, the seconder of the Address, advanced, and had also the honour to kiss Lands. The deputation then retired from the Royal presence.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert remained by the side of her Majesty during the reception of the Address. The Ladies in Waiting, the Viscountess Jocelyn and the Countess of Charlemont, were behind the Queen on her right. The Lord Steward, Sir Robert Peel, Sir James Graham, and the Earl of Dalhousie, stood on the Queen's right. The Vice-Chamberlain and the Duke of Wellington stood on Her Majesty's left.

The Cabinet Ministers, the Duke of Buccleuch, the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, Lord Granville Somerset, the Earl of Lincoln, and the Right Hon. Sydney Herbert, and also the Gentlemen of the Household in Waiting, were ranged on either side of the Throne.

Her Majesty's Hon. Corps of Gentlemen at Arms lined the apartment.

The Lord Mayor and deputation from the Corporation of the City of Dublin arrived at the Castle at half-past two o'clock. His Lordship and the members of the Corporation appeared in their respective municipal robes of office, and the officers carried their badges. His Lordship was accompanied by Mr Thomas Reynolds, Marshal of Dublin; Mr. Cor. P Shannon, Town Councillor; Mr. Thomas L. Steadi, High Constable; Rev. Edward H. Nelson, Chaplain; M. Duckworth Nelson, Physician and Surgeon; Mr. T. J. Bensley, Secretary; Mr. Thomas Atkins, Sword-bearer; and Mr. James Curran, Mace-bearer.

His Lordship and the deputation on alighting at the State Entrance, were conducted by the Grand Staircase through the Grand Chamber to St. George's Hall and the Waterloo Chamber, where they partook of the collation. Returning to St. George's Hall the deputation was summoned to the presence of the Sovereign, and were conducted by the Vice-Chamberlain to the presence of the Queen on the Throne.

The Lord Mayor then read the Address from the Corporation of the City of Dublin

The Address, after alluding to the "danger that exists of a whole people under your Majesty's sway falling even lower in the scales of human and Christian existence, its usual concomitant, if measures shall not be promptly taken by your Majesty's Government, under the blessing of a merciful God, to avert from Ireland such a calamity," went on to say "that, from causes over which your people of Ireland have had no control, they have been reduced for many, very many years to look to the potato crop as the only source from whence to draw their daily sustenance. To them, beyond the people of all other nations, was assigned the lot—the only food, the poorest food in the world, and of that, for the vast majority of them, their supply was scanty; but their wretchedness did not terminate even at this point; for them their fare still a step lower in the scales of misery—their quality of food was not only scanty and of the worst kind, but of late years they were compelled to eat out existence on the very worst species of their food alas! food unfitted for the brute animal was and is the food of the vast majority of your subjects in Ireland.

"May it please your Majesty, this state of destitution of your people, although known to us, who live among and form a portion of them here, rests not on our evidence. Commissioners, appointed by your Majesty, in their Report now published to the world, have announced that the agricultural labourers of Ireland and their families are calculated to amount to more than four millions of human beings, whose only food is the potato, whose only drink is water, whose houses are pervious to the rain, to whom a bed or a blanket is a luxury unknown, and who are more wretched than any other people in Europe.

"This statement is too true, but it is confined to one class alone—agricultural labourers. We are compelled to add, that this description of the destitution of four millions of your subjects, when it says they are more wretched than any other people in Europe, does not convey the whole truth; for there are, alas! many more of your people, not included in the class designated by the Commissioners, who should be added, who are on the verge of famine, and this is related of the inhabitants of a country which, of late years, may be justly termed the granary of England, exporting annually from the midst of a starving population food of the best kind in sufficient abundance for treble its own inhabitants."

After further alluding to the condition of Ireland, and the danger of the people of that country being without food for three months, the Address proceeded:

"We submit that, to avert a national calamity of this kind, great national undertakings of public utility for national good should be resorted to; that the national treasury should be poured out to give employment to the people at remunerative wages, such as would enable them to pay for food at the high rate at which it may be had, either arising from its better quality than that heretofore used, or the increase of the demand where the supply may be straitened from the loss of the crop. Such, we submit, are the leading measures to be promptly resorted to: employment of the people on national works—wages commensurate with the costs of living—freedom for import of provisions; mercantile enterprise will supply the rest."

The Address, in conclusion, prays her Majesty to summon Parliament for an early day, "that such measures may be passed as may enable your Majesty, under an all-wise Providence, to be the saviour of your Irish people from the scourge of famine, and that having been the instrument in his hands to avert the threatened calamity from Ireland, you may for many, many years govern a loyal, happy, and contented people."

Her Majesty made the following reply to the Address.

"I have heard with pain the statement which you have thought it necessary to address me respecting the extreme poverty of a portion of my Irish subjects, and the aggravation of their distress which you anticipate from a deficiency of food in the present year.

"The welfare and prosperity of Ireland are objects of my constant care and earnest solicitude, and the failure of the last potato crop, and its apprehended consequences, have not escaped my attention.

"I have directed precautions to be taken, which may, I trust, alleviate the evils unavoidably attendant on this calamity, and I have summoned Parliament to meet on an early day.

"I look with confidence to the advice which I shall receive from the United Council of the realm, and I shall rejoice if measures can be devised which, under the blessings of Divine Providence, may relieve the wants of my Irish people—may improve their condition and ensure their future happiness and contentment."

The Lord Mayor and Town Councillor Shannon had then the honour to kiss hands, and the deputation withdrew from the Royal presence.

A DELECTABLE POEM,

SHOWING HOW

TWO CORPORATIONS WENT TO WINDSOR, AND HOW ONE GOT LUNCHEON AT THE PALACE, AND THE OTHER DIDN'T.

There's agitation at Paddington Station,
For the London and Dublin Corporation
With their brace of Lord Mayors,
And Town Council in pairs,
Are bound to Windsor on weighty affairs;
They bear a petition
For Royal permission
That the ports may be opened to let in provision,
For a duty that State owes
To eaters of 'tatoes,
Not regarding the fruges consumere natos,
Or landed proprietors
Who call poor men rioters
Who object to take bad corn grain for their dieters,
But insist that the grain
Of France, Belgium, or Spain,
Fills the belly as well as the corn of Cockaigne.

Slough Station is gained, we have plenty of time,
And Aldermen's appetites always are prime;
So take it easy, oh,
For Mr. Batson
Has prepared a déjeûner, ample and greasy, oh,
And London's deputies nothing loath,
Count on dining at Slough and Windsor both.
But Dublin is wiser, and rather than stop,
They take the committees, jump on the top,
With swords, robes, and maces,
In big packing-cases,
Like every day travellers they take their places;
And off to Windsor,
Where the Inn, Sir,
Where the people who're waiting to see them come in, Sir,
Don't make the least fuss,
Not expecting them thus,
A whole Corporation outside of a 'bus.

Meanwhile at Slough, each knife and fork
Wisely and well hath done its work,
On all sorts of dishes,
Reptiles, and fishes,
And each has been solemnly judged "delicious!"
When the City Remembrancer, learned in the law
Stops short in a cut of paté de foie gras,
And round as a puncheon,
Says, "If we go on munching
We'll have no room left for the Palace luncheon."

The Remembrancer's solemn warning fell
On his brethren's ears like a passing bell,
'T was a weighty cause
That made them pause,
Shove their plates from before them, and hold their jaws.

Lord Mayor to Remembrancer bow'd his thanks,
And marshall'd afresh his Corporate ranks,
And, taking his watch, cried, "Now, if you please;
We've no time, I declare, for port or cheese.
It 's a quarter to two—
What on earth shall we do?
For her Majesty 's punctual, and sure to look blue;
If we 're late by a minute,
We 'll put our feet in it;
So, off to the Castle—we've just time to win it."

Then each Alderman whisper'd his civic brother,
"Where there 's room for one luncheon, there's room for another."
And each, thinking this an agreeable whet,
Left the Royal Hotel with less regret.
And now, amidst the noise
Of cads and small boys,
The Lord Mayor's state-coach through Windsor deploys;
His Lordship as red as his robes with pride,
And the sword and the mace sticking out at each side.

Black Rods, and White Rods, and pages, and all,
Conduct the cortège to the Waterloo Hall;
Where, in preparation
For each Corporation,
Is ranged, joyous sight, a most sumptuous collation.
Were I Ude or Carême,
I don't think I could name
All there was in the shape of soups, fish, meat, and game:
Such potages, such purées,
Such superb entremets,
Such salmis, quenelles, marinades and soufflés;
Faisan truffé,
Dindon velouté;
Perdrix aux Truffes, à la Reine, en croûte,
Au Gratin, suprême, aux choux, à la Condé—
In fact, I may say,
Without delay,
Each sort of good thing, dressed in each sort of way.

Oh! didn't the Aldermen's mouths overflow?
And didn't they curse their first luncheon at Slough?
And didn't they fume as the Chaplain said grace,
And mentally pray that he 'd quicken his pace?
And didn't each handle his knife and his fork,
And wait for the signal for going to work?
Each hand is raised for the murderous attack—
Each plate is shoved forward—each button is slack—
And each man is helping himself the first,
And those who came latest are like to fare worst;
When just as they 're starting,
Sir William Martin
—(How to do such a thing could he e'er find his heart in?)—
Pops his head in to say,
"My Lord Mayor, stop this way—
Her Majesty waits, and you 've no time to stay."
Folks may talk about severing husbands and wives,
Parents and children, men and their lives,
But was e'er separation so cruel I wonder,
As when Martin and Byng, in a voice of thunder,
Tore that Corporate body and luncheon asunder?

No hopes their appetites of sating,
They follow the Gentleman Ushers in waiting,
And with lingering looks at the cold collation,
Each behind his Lordship takes his station,
And enters the presence—
(They all have had lessons
In the style how to do it, and don't make a mess hence);
Only sometimes the sword, or
Mace gets out of order,
And almost upsets Mr. Law, the Recorder.
But while the Address the Recorder was reading,
At every passage that touched upon feeding,
And shortness of grub,
They thought of their snub—
"Shall we lunch as we go back again, there's the rub?"

Meanwhile the Corporation of Dublin
Had wisely saved themselves all trouble in Solving such question, by lunching in double, in Waterloo Hall,
Where waiters and all,
Their Milesian appetites hugely appal;
They prove to the Saxon,
If he lays a tax on
Irishmen's bellies, and Irishmen's backs on,
Such a chance of vengeance is not to be lost,
As a luncheon at Windsor, at Royal cost.
Not the great Liberator
Could wish for a greater
Triumph of Erin o'er Saxon Arch-traitor;
For the Lord Mayor and Corporate body of London
By their Dublin brethren are fairly undone:
Had they ev'n come back through Waterloo Hall,
They 'd have found the fragments, and that had been all;
For never did Aldermen manage quicker
To empty the dishes and floor the liquor.

MORAL.

Let every Windsor deputation
(Especially if from a Corporation)
Not stop at Slough,
Though you 'd wish to do so;
But at once to the Palace for luncheon go.
You 'll find what I say
Is the pleasantest way—
You'll lunch better; besides, you 'll have nothing to pay.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

The hubbub and the excitement, and the fraziness of the New Year's Day, have passed, and the reign of sugar-plums and gifts, and veals, are now with the years beyond the flood. You can have no idea in your comparatively quiet London, of the sensation which these annual events produce in Paris. The whole city is awake ere cock-crow, and myriads of people are to be seen passing to and fro, laden with boxes and parcels: servants, shop-boys, and porters are at a premium, and many thousands of francs change hands in the forms of small pictorial volumes, boxes of sweetmeats, papier maché toys, and questionable jewellery. From the Court to the attic, these demonstrations of affection, or friendship, or rivalry, are predominant. And yet beneath this theatrical feeling—for all here is theatrical—what heart-burnings and animosities are engendered! Whole families are discomforted; for either the present received is not equal in value to the gift rendered, or their distribution gives birth to querulousness and bad blood, and a whole year is required to wash out the remembrance of the neglect or favouritism. The sums paid to servants are enormous: and these come in such a questionable shape, that you must speak to them. The truth is, that you have to pay in hard cash, in every instance, 50 per cent higher than the value; and yet, forsooth, the Parisians preach about their vast generosity, and the glorious amiability of these mercantile reciprocations. Believe me, it is mere tinsel and moonshine, and a thick sediment of selfishness sticks to the bottom. But the grandeur of the Jour de l'An is well and sonorously kept up in the Champs Elysées, a short distance from the Barrière de l'Etoile. The mansion has been superbly furnished. It was formerly occupied by an American millionnaire. M. Guizot visited in person the apartments, to assure himself that all was in readiness to receive the new and distinguished guest. The French press has issued during the last year 6521 works in the dead and living languages, 1403 engravings and lithographs, 492 musical works, and 104 topographical, &c.; making a total of 8520 Works!

FRANCE

The Paris papers give an account of the presentation of the customary addresses to Louis Philippe on the occasion of the new year. On that day the King received the members of the corps diplomatique, the Presidents and Deputations of the two Chambers, the Archbishop of Paris, and other dignitaries of the State. His Majesty replied to the Address of the Baron de Werdel, spokesman of the corps diplomatique, in the following terms:

"I always experience great satisfaction in receiving the congratulations of the corps diplomatique. I feel much affected at your appreciation of my constant endeavours to prevent or avert everything calculated to bring down upon France, and the world, the scourge of war, and to entwine and prolong, as much as possible can, the happy accord existing at present between all the Sovereigns and all the Governments. I unite with you most sincerely in thanking God for his continuous protection. Every new year of peace he grants to us is an additional pledge of its stability; and when, looking back, we reckon with happiness the numerous years of peace we have enjoyed, we can read in the future, with the same confidence, and presage to the world, a long continuance of that great blessing. I am extremely sensible of what you have said of my children, and of the interest you have taken in the consolations it has pleased Providence to confer upon me by increasing my numerous family, and it is with pleasure I receive that expression through your organ. I thank the corps diplomatique for their good wishes, in the name of the Queen and all my family."

The King, in his reply to the President of the Chamber of Deputies, said—

"I am happy to acknowledge with you the powerful aid we derived from the co-operation of the Chamber of Deputies in weathering the storms with which we were assailed, and in bringing the vessel of the state into harbour, where we are so happy, so proud, and so glorious to unfold it to-day. Strengthened by that co-operation, that union, those sentiments, and that appreciation of all the blessings conferred upon France by Providence, we henceforth defy all the attempts of agitators to compromise the great and fortunate results we have achieved. With your affection, with the support of public opinion and the general co-operation of the nation, we will accomplish the exalted destinies of France; we will continue to care at the same time the happiness of the rich and the poor; we will maintain all the liberties. Upon them rest the advantages we have acquired. We will teach all classes of society to appreciate them more and more, to know that in wishing to exceed them they destroy them, and to be grateful to God for the blessings we enjoy. Whatever value may be attached to my life, the trust committed to me by France—her institutions and liberties—shall be faithfully kept by my children. I thank you for your acknowledgment of their devotedness and patriotism. I am happy to express to you once more the affection I feel for the Chamber of Deputies, and my gratitude for your good wishes in behalf of the Queen, my family, and myself."

The Paris politicians are just now engaged in the consideration of the new budget. M. Lacave Laplagne, the Minister of Finance, brought forward the annual financial statement in the Chamber on Saturday last. He commenced by presenting a project of law for the regulation of the accounts of 1843, and another project for granting extraordinary supplies for 1845 and 1846. The Minister began by taking a general view of the situation of the country, which he found to be most satisfactory. France had nothing to apprehend on the score of scarcity of provisions; and, in that respect, was more happily circumstanced than most manufacturing countries. He proceeded next to notice the fluctuations of the Money Market, which, he said, was of a transitory character, and was owing to local and peculiar circumstances. Now that so many great lines of railway had been adjudicated and the money of so many companies no longer tied up, everything would assume a more steady course. Having detailed at great length the imports of former years, he showed that with regard to 1846, it would only require a surplus of little more than 70,000,000f. to clear off the heavy deficiencies bequeathed by the memorable year 1840, and which three years ago had been estimated at 371,609,072f. In consequence of this happy financial situation, the Minister announced the intended introduction of measures for the improvement of different branches of the public service. Public credit had been sustained; still it was not the intention of the Government to attempt, this year, the conversion of the Five per Cents. To do so, he thought, might disturb that firmness which was now beginning to manifest itself in the financial and commercial affairs of the kingdom. He went on to intimate that a new registration of lands and property was requisite, in order to a more equal division of taxation. His plans, therefore, are The non-conversion of the Five per Cents. for at least one year; the introduction of a uniform postage on letters; and a new assessment of taxes throughout the country.

Sums would be demanded for repairing the losses of naval materiel, and for supplying the marine arsenals in a way sufficiently effective to be in harmony with the necessities of the fleet, so as to be able to provide the latter upon all emergencies, armed either for the demands of commerce or of political interests. Independent of these expenses, a sum of 8,000,000f. would be required for extending armaments, and for the execution of the law relative to slaves. Having noticed some minor demands, the Minister turned to the budget of 1847, the result of which would show

Receipts	..	..	..	..	1,337,970,690
Expenditure	..	..	..	..	1,334,717,018
Excess of receipts	..	..	..	..	3,153,652

Admiral Mackau then rose, and presented a project of law demanding 100,000 francs for naval constructions—of which 13,300,000 francs would only be taken for the year 1847. Admiral Mackau, in bringing forward this measure, said that one of the main objects with the Government was to place the fleet upon the scale and footing laid down by the Royal Ordinances of 1837 and 1842 The bill was referred to the bureau of the Chamber, without any remark, but no doubt a lengthened debate will take place on the subject at a future sitting.

The Monsteur contains a despatch, from Marshal Bugeaud, of the 7th of December, announcing that the evening before he ascended the Mina towards Guesela, intending to reach the Grand Place, when he overtook the Beni-Snassen tribes, and made 500 prisoners, after killing 300. He announces similar successes on the part of Generals de Lamoricière, Bedeau, and Jousouf

The Queen of the French has been rather unhopsed, but the last accounts are favourable

DEATH OF SIR LEWIS GOLDSMITH We regret to announce the death of Mr Lewis Goldsmith (father of Lady Lovelace), which event took place on Sunday evening, at his residence, in the Rue de la Paix, Paris. His decease was unexpected, although he had been seriously ill for the last few days. Mr. Goldsmith was the author, among other clever works, of the best summary extant on the scale and footing laid down by the Royal Ordinances of 1837 and 1842 The bill was referred to the bureau of the Chamber, without any remark, but no doubt a lengthened debate will take place on the subject at a future sitting. on the state of the French navy, and to the Military Committee, to institute a similar inquiry into the condition of the land defences; and the Naval Committee respecting its reorganisation, all of which inquiries were considered with a view to efficient precautions by land and sea against the danger apprehended of a foreign invasion.

In addition to the above, we have received advices by the packet-ship New York, which reached Liverpool on Wednesday, but the mail did not arrive as not later. and the papers do not contain the report of the debate in Congress.

The New York Courier and Inquirer of the 16th contains the following:

A letter which we publish this morning, from our Washington Correspondent, contains a statement which may be deemed as having an important bearing upon our relations with Great Britain, and will be found confirmatory of the opinions expressed by ourselves on that subject. An interview of some length had taken place between Mr. Buchanan and the British Minister, undirected to the Oregon question, and if, as the rumour is at Washington, Lord Aberdeen has expressed the feeling intended in relation to Mr. Pakenham's correspondence with our Government, it is certainly of some importance.

THE CORN LAWS.

There have been various meetings during the week in different parts of the country, some in favour of the Corn-laws, and others for their immediate and total abolition. Among the most significant of the Anti Corn-law meetings was one composed of agricultural labourers, held at Wootton Bassett, Wiltshire, on Monday. The Times gives the following description of it:—"A bona fide and thoroughly remarkable and important character at the present crisis, was held, on Monday night, at a village, six miles beyond Wootton-Bassett, called Seagrave, a small place, with an agricultural population scarcely exceeding 200 persons, and thoroughly rounded at various distances by several similar villages or hamlets. The Chairman was a labourer; the speakers, with the exception of two, were labourers; and the object in view was to call public attention to the present condition of the labouring population in this part of the country, and to petition her Majesty and the Legislature to take decisive steps for the speedy relief of that severe distress. The meeting was to have been held in a large booth erected in a field, but the great expense of providing such accommodation was beyond the combined contributions which those poor people could spare from their very scanty means; and therefore they were compelled to assemble together in the cross-road of the village, and to endure the inclemency of a winter night while they talked over their common sufferings. The whole of the arrangements and proceedings were strikingly characteristic of the condition of the people. A barrel was turned up, driven into the ground beneath a hedge on the road side, formed a narrow and unsteady platform, capable of supporting only the chairman and one speaker at a time. But this rude erection were placed a small tremor passed over her frame as the first sound of the chapel bell struck upon her ear. There was but momentary, however, and regaining her self-possession immediately, she kissed the nurse who had attended her during the night, and bade her farewell. She then shook hands severally with the Sheriffs, Sub-Sheriffs, the Chaplain, and some of the officials. The mournful procession was then formed, and the prisoner, still retaining her firmness and self possession in a remarkable degree, fell in immediately behind the Rev. Ordinary, who read the service for the burial of the dead as the procession crossed the chapel-yard and re-entered the passages of the prison.

The wretched culprit walked forward with a remarkably firm step, throughout the whole distance requiring no support whatever, and mounting the scaffold with a degree of activity which surprised all who witnessed it. Her appearance without the walls of the prison did not attract any considerable number from the populace beyond a general cry of "Hats off," which was silenced in a very few moments. After reaching the summit of the scaffold she turned round towards the Rev. Mr. Davis and again bade him farewell, still retaining her presence of mind and appearing [illegible] to be moved than an ordinary spectator of the scene might have been [illegible] next moment she resigned herself to the executioner, who placed her under the fatal beam. The rope was then adjusted, a cap was drawn over [illegible] and the Rev. Ordinary having given the signal, a bolt was withdrawn, [illegible] the unhappy wretch was launched into eternity; the last words uttered by [illegible] after being, "The Lord have mercy on my soul."

The convict Samuel Quennell was removed from Newgate, immediately upon his conviction, to Horsemonger-lane Gaol. The supposed state of mind which the culprit exhibited during his trial, did not desert him up to the latest moment.

Quennell slept soundly on Sunday night, and, by his own request, was awoke at an early hour on Monday morning. The Rev. Mr. Davis arrived at the prison about five o'clock, and was engaged in prayer with the prisoner until seven o'clock, at which hour the latter partook of breakfast; subsequently he was allowed, at his own request, to walk in the prison-yard for half an hour. At nine o'clock he partook of the Sacrament in the prison chapel, after which he again engaged in prayer with the Rev. Ordinary until the arrival of the Sheriff of Surrey, at a quarter to ten o'clock. The ceremony usual upon the commencement of fatal proceedings was then gone through, and Sir Robert Peel [illegible] five minutes to ten o'clock he was introduced to the condemned cell, where the prisoner submitted to be pinioned without a murmur, maintaining the same demeanour which had characterised him throughout [illegible] precisely the procession moved to the scaffold, which was erected [illegible] the prison, immediately over the centre gate. The prisoner [illegible] without the slightest assistance, and, having first taken leave of the [illegible] himself in the proper position, immediately below the cross-beam. The executioner then completed the necessary preparations, and, the bolt having been withdrawn, the drop fell, and the culprit died apparently without a struggle.

There was a large crowd of spectators in front of the gaol to witness the execution, and several hardened robberies were committed immediately beneath the gallows

The body was cut down at eleven o'clock, and in the course of the day it was buried within the precincts of the gaol.

the accurate sum that I earned from September 16, 1811, till November 23, 1844, which is about 33 weeks together, with the amount of money earned by me down to the 31st of December, 1845, which, if I reckon right, is about 119 weeks and three days. Together with relief when ill, and 20 weeks for a boy, 13 years old, who was allowed 3d. a-day, the whole sum amounted to £42 3s. 8d., that is exactly 18s. a week, or forwards. Now, I, a labourer, with a wife and [illegible] children, to step forward, and, if he can, tell me in what I am to spend this mo[illegible] to pay every man I deal with 20s in the pound? (Why then [illegible] ying, "To obtain our rights effectually, we must all, with one [illegible]t, fill up our cry and petition her Majesty to remove the restrictions upon trade and commerce, so that the poor labourer may get cheap food and cheese, and good table-beer, to enable them to do the work which their present scanty fare never can. (Hear, hear.) May that cry meet with a reply from our gracious Queen. God save the Queen! (Cheers, and responses of 'Amen.') Friends, every man who is born and bred a labourer has for his birthright a living from the soil, to be obtained without being restricted by any laws unjust laws, I might call 'em—enforced by our Legislature." (Cheers.)

Several similar declarations of poverty were made by labourers, who spoke against the Corn-laws as injurious to them.

A man named Taylor said he had no work and was starving. The report contains this note:—

[This poor man need not have called himself a starving man, his emaciated appearance spoke a stronger language than his voice could.]

It was then proposed that petitions to Parliament should be adopted against the Corn-laws.

Mr Edwards, in seconding the motion, said he believed that Sir Robert Peel was inclined to do justice to the working people of this country; but it mattered not to them, as working people, whether a Whig or Tory held the reins of Government, so long as they were well fed and clothed. (A Voice—"And no curry powder.") And no curry powder (Laughter and cheers.)

The motion was then agreed to, as also one of thanks to the public press—that portion of it which advocated the rights of the people.

There was a very spirited Free-Trade meeting at Newcastle-upon-Tyne on Monday, at which Mr. Bright and Mr. Cobden attended, and delivered eloquent speeches.

Among other meetings held in support of the Corn-laws, the following may be enumerated. At Croydon, Petworth, Lincoln, Horncastle, King's Lynn (Norfolk), &c. At several of these meetings great mistrust of Sir Robert Peel was expressed.

THE RAILWAY PROGRESS.

THE BROAD GAUGE

On Wednesday an experiment was made with the broad gauge line between [illegible]ington and Didcot, with a passenger train of one hundred and twenty tons [illegible] The engine employed was the Ixion, the same that was used in the previous experiments. She weighs 22 tons, and is a six-wheel engine, with a seven feet driving-wheel. The rail was favourable day for a [illegible]r although there was scarcely any wind stirring, the rails were in a [illegible] greasy state. The trip was to have been started from the first mile-post, but owing to the greasy condition of the rails and the consequent slipping condition of the driving-wheels, the time was not taken till the train reached the fourth mile-post, which was passed at 8h. 37m. 37s. The train passed the 31 mile-post at 10h. 1m. 12s. The 46 miles were therefore performed in 1h. 23m. 35s., or at the average speed of nearly 44 miles per hour. The maximum speed was 48 miles per hour. The return trip was commenced at 11h. 8m. 10s., and at 12h. 15m. 12s. the train had gone over the 31 miles, running the distance with one hundred and twenty tons, at an average rate of forty-seven miles per hour. The maximum speed was 53½ miles per hour.

On Thursday another experiment with the broad gauge was made on the Great Western Railway, between Didcot and Paddington, with a luggage engine, having a train consisting of twenty-nine trucks, one first-class carriage, and an extra tender. The trucks were laden with coals, and exclusive of the engine and tender, weighed 440 tons 11 cwt. The Hercules engine was selected for the purpose of conveying the train from Didcot, and was dispatched from Paddington at twenty minutes after ten A.M., with a train of thirteen trucks, heavily laden with coals, and one first-class carriage; the remainder of the trucks, to complete the weight, were propelled by the Ixion, which propelled the experimental train on the journey, and started simultaneously with the Hercules after ten A.M. On the down journey the Ixion's works became deranged at West Drayton, and the train was consequently detained at Slough until another engine (the Pelican) could be sent from Paddington. On its arrival one of which the train proceeded to Didcot, to be connected with the Hercules. Owing to the dampness of the morning the rails were in a very slippery state, notwithstanding which, an average rate of speed, or nearly twenty-four and a-half miles an hour, was attained.

CANTERBURY AND LONDON.—Trains conveying [illegible] have commenced travelling the Canterbury and Ashford Branch, which will bring Canterbury and London within three hours and a half journey with each other.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

EXECUTION OF MARTHA BROWNING AND SAMUEL QUENNELL.

On Monday morning these two miserable creatures suffered death, the former at Newgate, and the latter at Horsemonger-lane.

Martha Browning, it will be recollected, was convicted at the last sessions of the Central Criminal Court of the murder of an old woman in Westminster, under circumstances which have already appeared in this journal

Samuel Quennell was convicted at the same sessions of the deliberate murder of his fellow-workman in the Kennington-road, by whom he was once.

The conduct of Martha Browning since her conviction, was very becoming the awful situation in which she was placed. For some time subsequent to her arrest the youth of the culprit, coupled with the circumstance of the fatal crime with which she was charged, contributed to excite a degree of sympathy in her behalf; and it was not until after her conviction, when she made a full confession, that anything like a general opinion was pronounced as to her guilt. On Friday (last week) the wretched woman took a last farewell of those members of her family who have visited her during her confinement. These include her brother and sister, the latter of whom is in service in London. As may be readily imagined, the scene was of a very distressing nature, though the convict's fortitude under the circumstances was surprising. It is a singular fact that the unhappy woman never expressed any desire to see her father and mother, an aged couple residing at Alton, in Hampshire.

On Sunday morning the culprit attended divine service in the prison chapel, and marked attention to the service, especially the sermon. The unhappy woman listened with the most perfect composure throughout; and at the conclusion of the service returned, unassisted, to her cell.

The Sheriffs, Messrs. Laurie and Chaplin, with their Under-Sheriffs, Messrs. Wire and Bircham, arrived at Newgate soon after seven o'clock, and shortly before eight were admitted to an interview with the culprit.

At five minutes to eight, everything being in readiness, Calcraft, the executioner, entered the cell for the purpose of pinioning the culprit. The unhappy woman bore from the scene of the operation, which occupied, and at once resigned herself into the hands of the officer She bore the trying process without the manifestation of any feeling beyond shedding a few tears, which, however, ceased to flow before the operation was concluded. They had not left the prisoner's cell for more than a few minutes, however, and regaining her self-possession immediately, she kissed the nurse who had attended her during the night, and bade her farewell. She then shook hands severally with the Sheriffs, Sub-Sheriffs, the Chaplain, and some of the officials. The mournful procession was then formed, and the prisoner, still retaining her firmness and self possession in a remarkable degree, fell in immediately behind the Rev. COUNTRY NEWS.

INTERMENT OF MR. GLADSTONE, FROM NEWARK. The acceptance of office by Mr. Gladstone, of course made his seat for Newark vacant, but it appears that the honourable gentleman does not intend to offer himself again for that borough. Mr Gladstone, in a letter to his late constituents, states that the sole ground for his retirement is his belief that "a candidate recommended to their favour through local connection, will offer himself for their suffrages." Mr. John Stuart, Queen's Counsel, has already offered himself for the vacant seat in Newark The learned gentleman is a staunch Conservative, and has expressed his determination "to oppose any measures which will have the effect of sacrificing the agricultural interests."

REPRESENTATION OF LINCOLN.—The people of Lincoln are making preparations for a contest in the event of a dissolution of Parliament. Colonel Sibthorp has notified to those whose votes he received at the last election, that he will again solicit their suffrages, but some doubts appear to have existed with respect to the intentions of Mr. Colley. Two "Citizen candidates" have already taken the field, viz., Mr. Seeley, a miller, and Mr. H. W. Jones, a general dealer. The former stands on "free-trade, the latter on "protection" principle.

THE RATING OF PRINCE ALBERT'S FARM, AT WINDSOR.—We have already alluded to the alleged claims of the parish of Windsor, for arrears of Poor-rates to the amount of £228, upon Flemish Farm. Cases have been submitted to Sir Frederick Thesiger and also to Sir Thomas Wilde, and both these eminent legal authorities agree in opinion that the Prince-Consort, under the circumstances which had been brought before them, although the farm was rated, and a large portion of it used for fattening the cattle of his Royal Highness, was not liable to be rated, inasmuch as the property in question belonged to the Crown. It has been stated in the parish offices that the Crown had granted a lease of the farm to the Prince-Consort, and that his Royal Highness occupied the land rent-free. It was also denied by Mr. Anson that the Prince had beneficially occupied the farm, and the parish officers had been admitted on the part of the Crown, must prove that his Royal Highness really had a beneficial occupation before they could legally recover the amount claimed by them for arrears of rates. A very interesting fact has been elicited by the parish officers in making enquiry (a large sum being demanded immediately by the Guardians of the Windsor Union), when the whole of the correspondence which has passed between the legal adviser of the parish and the Prince Consort, as well as the determination of the law has been come to by the Prince, will be laid before the inhabitants, in order that they may decide upon their future proceedings in the matter.

EXTRAORDINARY INCREASE.—The increase in the number of houses built in Liverpool has been great, beyond all precedent, during the last two years, as will be seen by the following statement. No less than 2450 houses were erected in 1844, and the still more extraordinary number of 3738 were erected in 1845, within the Parliamentary borough, to say nothing of the hundreds built beyond the limits, in the direction of the Old Swan, and the still greater number built on the Cheshire side of the river. The following particulars of the increase of houses from 1838 to 1845 are very remarkable: 1838, 1052 houses; 1839, [illegible] houses; 1841, 1061 houses; 1842 2227 houses; 1843, 1250 houses; 1844, 2450 houses; 1845, 3763 houses. Total, 14,002. In 1845, the [illegible] houses built in the north district of the town were 1059; in the east, 1041; and in the south, 1263. The warehouses erected in the north district were 51; in the east, 14; and in the south, 12. Total of houses and warehouses together 3763

THE ACCIDENT AT THE LIVERPOOL WATERWORKS.—Another death has occurred from the melancholy accident which occurred at the Waterworks, Liverpool, on Christmas-day. The individual who [illegible]stained the wounds received by the following statement. No less than 2450 houses were erected in 1844, and the still more extraordinary number of 3738 were erected in 1845, within the Parliamentary borough, to say nothing of the hundreds built beyond the limits, in the direction of the Old Swan, and the still greater number built on the Cheshire side of the river. IRELAND.

THE REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—The usual meeting of the Repeal Association took place on Monday. Mr. O'Connell commenced his speech by his accustomed tirades against the Times Commissioners, and after handling in £41 from the O'Connell family, he went on as follows: "And now for the opening of the new year. This is Henry Grattan's birth month for the Repeal! (Cheers.) He hoped that before this year closed, the 1 Parliament would be opened in College-green. (Cheers.) Another year of lark[illegible] and slavery had passed over, but he hoped that would be the last. Many a weary month was unmanly sighs over what was past; they would rather look with cheerfulness to the future. He had seven years the past history of Repeal. This was the beginning of the seventh year of the Repeal. The people of Ireland ought to rally with him to rescue their country from thraldom. Providence had done much for the country, but now had failed in his duty towards her. Let them then struggle with him for nationality. He was a Protestant, but no Catholic ever worked more zealously for Ireland as a final measure. A speech of his, delivered in 1813, on the Peel Catholic Emancipation, and he then announced his ultimate view in looking for Emancipation to Repeal. He was unsure that he had voted or disguised the finality of his purposes. In 1834, the question of Repeal had been previously discussed in Parliament, and on that occasion there were 500 votes against the measure, and some 40 in favour of it. Such there was then a pledge given that Irish grievances should be redressed. But had this pledge been kept? (No.) [illegible] was false and hollow. The only object of the snare was to quiet the Irish. But that plighted word, he (Mr. O'Connell) thought it right to give up the agitation for a while, and for two years he entirely abstained from it. He then was induced to set up his Precursor Society. In that Society it was their rule to give free to Ireland to do justice to Ireland, but when at last he discovered that Parliament meant to do nothing, he dissolved that Association, and now formed the Repeal! (Cheers.) They would now take nothing else from England but the Repeal (Cheers.) He would not be satisfied with less than a domestic legislature; and would anybody tell him that he would not carry the Repeal? (Cheers.) He would take no compromise—he would refuse no act of justice, no grace for those Repeal Members who [illegible]ed, nevertheless, he would still insist upon the Repeal. Last year did not pass away without its glorious meetings. They had added two hundred thousand names to the list of Repeal members and subscribers. They had in Ireland various great monster meetings, and a [illegible] leaves at the Rotunda. All Ireland had pledged itself to the American Treasury meeting, 500,000 as true men as ever stepped in Sloth-leather surrounded him. Taking all the monster meetings of last year together, at least two millions of people had declared for Repeal. The first moment of England's misfortune would then be their day of triumph. The Orangemen were joining them. A national party was springing up; so (Mr. O'Connell) would give them his hand with a hearth in it; he would readily join them, and he said, "Hurrah for the Irish party!" The Monarch of France could not live much longer. On his death his sons must cede to the warlike spirit of the nation, and we should have a war. England would then want us, and she should have us on the know terms of granting the Repeal. (Cheers.) Why don't they call out the Irish militia now? (They [illegible] The English Ministry thought to-day's America, but he must first conciliate Ireland. (Hear, hear, hear.) The learned gentleman concluded his speech by moving a string of resolutions, some thirteen or fourteen in number, which he proposed should be presented to the Queen on the meeting of Members of Parliament. He also moved that the Repeal Members should be requested to meet in Dublin immediately, in order to arrange their plan of campaign for the ensuing session. It was his (Mr. O'Connell's) opinion, that they should go to Parliament early in the session, to assist in despatching the English business, and then return to Ireland, in order to attend to their own. The resolutions having been put and carried, at four o'clock the rent for the week ending that day, dividend on stock) was announced to be £647 14s. Mr. O'Connell declines dining at the Lincoln's Inn, as he agrees to it to borough members, "as the Parliament meets for the despatch of business on the next day." He also declines dining at the festival" and, as he says, in his letter of apology, "he feels it a sacred duty to attend to the meeting of the House, in order to give the best support in his power to the Cheap Bread Bill, to be brought in by Sir Robert Peel—he cares not which either shall have his active support for that measure."

SCENES IN OREGON AND CALIFORNIA.

Every arrival of intelligence from the United States serves to increase the interest attached to the Oregon Territory, thus concisely described by the Hon. C. Cushing, late Commissioner of the United States to China:—

"There is a great region of this continent, washed by the Pacific Ocean, and bounded by the possessions of the Mexican Republic on the south, those of Russia on the north, and those of the United States and of Great Britain on the east, which is not yet subjected to the lawful government of any European or American power, and it is the only remaining part of North America which continues in such anomalous condition. In superficial extent it is nearly 400,000 square miles; that is, more than three times as large as the aggregate of all the British Islands, and about equal in extent to the original thirteen United States (393,000 square miles); and I shall presently show that its value is commensurate with its extent. This is Oregon."

To meet this curiosity, Messrs. Wiley and Putnam have just published an important work, entitled "A Narrative of the Exploring Expedition to the Rocky Mountains, in the year 1842; and to Oregon and North California, in the years 1843-44." The Expedition was under the superintendence of Capt. Fremont, who has reported two of his Tours to the Congress of the United States, of which the volume before us is the substance. Their field consisted of the immense west of the Rocky Mountains, extending to the Pacific Ocean, and bounded by the Russian frontier on the north, and California on the south. Capt. Fremont's Outward Journey was from Kansas Landing to Fort Vancouver, a distance of 2,766 miles; and the Homeward Journey by from the Dalles to the Missouri River.

The Narrative is a substantial volume of some 320 pages, filled with stirring adventure, picturesque description, and information of novel and attractive character. We have selected three scenes from the Illustrations to the work. The first is from the Outward Journey, and shows the American Falls on Lewis's Fork of the Colombia River, at Fort Hall, at an elevation of 4500 feet: it is 2384 miles from Kansas Landing; it is a great Fork of the Colombia, named after Lewis, the enterprising traveller.

Next is a striking Hill of Columnar Basalt on the Colombia.

The third Scene lay on the Homeward Journey, at 1559 miles' distance from the Dalles—a Pass in the Sierra Nevada of California, thus described in the Narrative:—

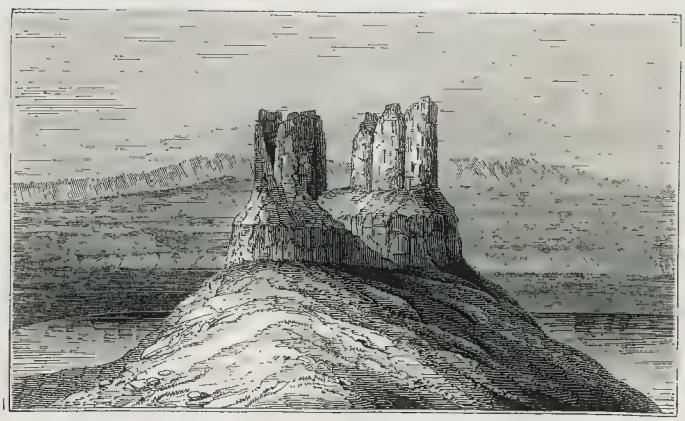
"The dividing ridge of the Sierra is in sight from this encampment. Accompanied by Mr. Preuss, I ascended to-day the highest peak to the right, from which we had a beautiful view of a mountain lake at our feet, about 15 miles in length, and so entirely surrounded by mountains that we could not discover an outlet. We had taken with us a glass, but though we enjoyed an extended view, the valley was half hidden in mist, as when we had seen it before. Snow could be distinguished on the higher parts o, the coast mountains; eastward, as far as the eye could extend, it ranged over a terrible mass of broken snowy mountains, fading off blue in the distance. The rock composing the summit consists of a very coarse, dark, volcanic conglomerate; the lower parts appeared to be of a slaty structure. The highest trees were a few scattering cedars and aspens. From the immediate foot of the peak we were two hours in reaching the summit, and one hour anda quarter in descending. The day had been very bright, still, and clear, and spring seems to be advancing rapidly. While the sun is in the sky the snow melts rapidly, and gushing springs cover the face of the mountain in all the exposed places, but their surface freezes instantly with the disappearance of the sun.

THE AMERICAN FALLS OF LEWIS FORK.

"The Indians of the Sierra make frequent descents upon the settlements west of the Coast Range, which they keep constantly swept of horses; among them are many who are called Christian Indians, being refugees from Spanish missions. Several of these incursions occurred while we were at Helvetia. Occasionally parties of soldiers follow them across the Coast Range, but never enter the Sierra."

The party had not long before passed through a beautiful country. The Narrative says—"During the earlier part of the day our ride had been over a very level prairie, or rather a succession of long stretches of prairie, separated by lines and groves of oak timber, growing along dry gullies, which are filled with water in seasons of rain; and, perhaps, also, by the melting snows. Over much of this extent the vegetation was sparse; the surface showing plainly the action of water, which, in the season of flood, the Joaquin spreads over the valley. About one o'clock we came again among innumerable flowers; and a few miles further, fields of the beautiful blue-flowering lupins, which seems to love the neighbourhood of water, indicated that we were approaching a stream. We here found this beautiful shrub in thickets, some of them being 12 feet in height. Occasionally three or four plants were clustered together, forming a grand bouquet, about ninety feet in circumference, and ten feet high; the whole summit covered with spikes of flowers, the perfume of which is very sweet and grateful. A lover of natural beauty can imagine with what pleasure we rode among these flowering groves, which filled the air with a light and delicate fragrance. We continued our road for about half a mile, interspersed through an open grove of live oaks, which, in form, were the most symmetrial and beautiful we had yet seen in this country. The ends of their branches rested on the ground, forming somewhat more than a half sphere of very full and regular figure, with leaves apparently smaller than usual. The Californian poppy, of a rich orange colour, was numerous today. Elk and several bands of antelope made their appearance. Our road now was one continued enjoyment; and it was pleasant riding among this assemblage of green pastures, with varied flowers and scattered groves, and, out of the warm green spring, to look at the rocky and snowy peaks where lately we had suffered so much.

Again, in the Sierra Nevada.—"Our journey to-day was in the midst of an advanced spring, whose green and flora beauty offered a delightful contrast to the sandy valley we had just left. All the day snow was in sight on the butt of the mountain, which frowned down upon us on the right; but we beheld itnow with feelings of pleasant security, as we rode along between green trees, and on flowers, with humming-birds and other feathered friends of the traveller enlivening the serene spring air. As we reached the summit of this beautiful pass, and obtained a view into the eastern country, we saw at once that here was the place to take leave of all such pleasant scenes as those around us. The distant mountains were now bald rocks again; and below, the land had any colour but green. Taking into consideration the nature of the Sierra Nevada, we found this pass an excellent one for horses; and, with a little labour, or perhaps with a more perfect examination of the localities, it might be made sufficiently practicable for waggons."



BASALTIC HILL ON THE COLUMBIA RIVER.

PASS IN THE SIERRA NEVADA, CALIFORNIA.

Capt. Fremont states himself to be well acquainted with the great range of the Sierra Nevada of the Alta California, and his journey has showed that this broad and elevated snowy ridge was a continuation of the Cascade Range of Oregon, between which and the ocean there is still another, and a lower range, parallel to the former and to the coast, and which may be called the Coast Range. No river from the interior does, or can cross the Sierra Nevada, itself more lofty than the Rocky Mountains; and as to the Buenaventura, the mouth of which, seen on the coast, gave the idea and the name of the reputed great river; it is, in fact, a small stream of no consequence, not only below the Sierra Nevada, but actually below the Coast Range—taking its rise within half a degree of the ocean, running parallel to it for about two degrees, and then falling into the Pacific, near Montery. There is no opening from the Bay of San Francisco into the interior of the Continent. The two rivers which flow into it are comparatively short, and not perpendicular to the coast, but lateral to it, and having their heads towards Oregon and Southern California. They open lines of communication north and south, and not eastwardly; and thus this want of interior communication from the San Francisco Bay, now fully ascertained, gives great additional value to the Colombia, which stands alone as the only great river on the Pacific slope of our Continent which leads from the ocean to the Rocky Mountains, and opens a line of communication from the sea to the valley of the Mississippi.

The following passage is very important, in connexion with our present position with America:—The Colombia is the only river which traverses the whole breadth of the country, breaking through all the ranges, and entering the sea. Draving its waters from a section of ten degrees of latitude in the Rocky Mountains, which are collected into one stream by three main forks (Lewis's, Clark's and the North Fork) near the centre of the Oregon valley, this great river thence proceeds by a sangle channel to the sea, while its three forks lead each to a pass in the mountains, which opens the way into the interior of the continent. This fact in relation to the rivers of this region gives an immense value to the Colombia. Its mouth is the only inlet and outlet to and from the sea; its three forks lead to the passes in the mountains; it is therefore the only line of communication between the Pacific and the interior of North America; and all operations of war or commerce, of national or social intercourse, must be conducted upon it. This gives it a value beyond estimation, and would involve irreparable injury if lost.

Commercially, the value of the Oregon country must be great, washed, as it is, by the North Pacific Ocean—fronting Asia—producing many of the elements of commerce and becoming, as it naturally will, a thoroughfare for the East India and China trade. That portion of the Pacific coast known as California, is now attracting an unusual share of the attention of the Government of the United States, Great Britain, and France. It is regarded by them as in itself one of the richest and most beautiful regions on earth; and, as destined, by its situation, its harbours, and its proximity to Asia, to influence, at no distant day, the commercial and political affairs of the world.

The Mexican Correspondent of the Times holds the possession of California by the British to be indispensable, to check the progress in wealth and power of the United States. That writer has repeatedly, intelligently, and most zealously urged upon the British Government the necessity of at once acquiring California by purchase from Mexico, insisting that thus, and thus only, can the American Republic be cut off from the West Pacific coast, and shut out from a most advantageous access to the trade of Asia. Substantially, the same view is urged in the leading and official papers of Paris.

In this state of things, the character, condition, and general relations of California become to us objects of the deepest interest. It has been generally understood that certain portions of the territory have been mortgaged to parties in England, by whom money has at various times been loaned to Mexico.

NEW SOUTH WALES.

The importance of the rising Colony of New South Wales assures us that our readers will be pleased to hear that we shall be able to present them with occasional sketches, illustrative of the scenery and progress which the Colony is making, both politically and socially.

The annexed sketch represents the exterior of the Council Chamber, Sydney, on the 29th July last, when the third Session of the Legislative Council was opened by his Excellency, Sir George Gipps, the Governor of the Colony.

There was a numerous attendance of members, and the house was closely filled with their friends and relatives, among whom was a considerable number of ladies, and both the strangers' and the reporters' galleries were crowded. At twelve o'clock, a salute from the battery at Fort Phillip announced that his Excellency was about to leave Government House for the Council Chamber. His Excellency proceeded to the Chamber, accompanied by his Private Secretary and Aide-de-Camp, in a carriage and four, attended, as usual, by mounted orderlies. In the Court-yard, in the front of the Council Chamber, there was a guard of honour, composed of the band and fifty rank and file of the 99th Regiment, commanded by Captain Reed and Lieutenant Leigh, the regimental colour being borne by Ensign de Winton, which received his Excellency with the usual honours. On its being announced that the Governor was approaching, the Speaker and several members, and the officers of the House, went to the door to meet his Excellency, and usher him to the Vice-Regal chair.

OPENING OF THE SYDNEY COUNCIL.

His Excellency having requested the Speaker to desire that honourable members would take their seats, opened the business of the session with the customary speech, congratulating the House on the manifest improvement in the condition of the Colony, and alluding to the remarkable fact, which must ever stand out conspicuously in Australian annals, that in the year 1844, for the first time in the history of New South Wales, the exports of the Colony exceeded the imports, and to the liberal prices which our exports continue to command in the home market. His Excellency declared he had reason to hope that the Revenue had passed the point of its lowest depression, and that it would henceforth increase in productiveness. The Governor stated that not only is the ordinary revenue of the Colony free from debt, but the cash balances now at the credit of Government in the colonial banks, exceed, collectively, all former amounts since the year 1841.

Among other points of the speech was the announcement of a measure for taking a Census of the Colony; the reduction of the duty on spirits, with a view to the suppression of illicit distillation; and a bill for enabling the Trustees of the Savings' Bank to lend a portion of their unemployed funds to the Corporation of Sydney. His Excellency retired immediately after having handed a copy of the Speech to the Speaker of the Council; and the Council then adjourned.

SYDNEY.—GENERAL VIEW.

The Legislative Council of New South Wales is a singularly constituted body; twelve of its members being nominated by the Queen, (or her representative, the Governor,) and twenty-four elected by the people of the Colony. The business of the Council thus constituted is conducted in much the same manner, and under the same general rules, as the business of Parliament. Members can introduce measures of any description, but all the more ordinary business is introduced by message from the Governor.

As in all Colonies, there are great complaints of the Colonial-office in Downing-street. The great struggle at present between the Colonists and the Mother Country is the management of the Land Fund—whether it should be vested in the Council of the Colony, or the Lords of the Treasury.

The Council Chamber is situated in Macquarie-street, on the east side of the City: it is a plain, but commodious building, having a spacious Council Hall, and the requisite Committee Rooms, and other offices.

The Council met for the first time in 1843, when Alexander McLeay, Esq., was elected Speaker. Mr. Mc. Leay, the distinguished naturalist, is well known in the Colony, having been for many years Secretary to the Transport Board, and also an active officer of the Linnean Society. Mr. McLeay went out to New South Wales in 1824, as Colonial Secretary, which office he held until 1837.

THE AUXILIARY STEAM PACKET-SHIP "MASSACHUSETTS."

THE AUXILIARY STEAM PACKET-SHIP, "MASSACHUSETTS."

This fine Steam or Screw Auxiliary Packet-ship arrived at Liverpool o Wednesday week, after a run of about thirty days, from New York, whence she sailed on the 17th ult., being her third trip across the Atlantic. She brought thirty passengers: the advices she conveyed had been anticipated by the steam-ship Cambria.

The Massachusetts presents a novel combination of sailing and steam power: she is fitted with an Ericsson screw propeller, which can be shifted whenever the wind renders it desirable to take advantage of the sailing qualities of the vessel; hence the term "Auxiliary Steam." In considering her speed, it should be recollected that the screw, as applied in this packet-ship, is merely an auxiliary propelling power, and can be of little, if indeed any use, unless in calms or against head winds. In calms, when the canvas becomes useless, it supplies a propelling power; and here its value is prominently shown. In light head winds it enables the ship still to progress; and if the ship accomplishes the voyage with as much greater rapidity than the ordinary packet-ships, as to recompense the owners for the loss of tonnage occasioned by the weight of, and space occupied by the machinery, then the experiment has resulted in success. On the boisterous northern Atlantic route, however, this good fortune was considered problematical, and her passage out to Liverpool, made in 17½ days, did not satisfy her friends; but her owner, Mr. B. Forbes, of Boston, regards this as a fair run.

It may next be important to review the return passage of the Massachusetts, as compared with ships sailing from Liverpool shortly before and after her, which may be exhibited in a tabular form:—

Name	Date of Sailing	Date of Arrival	At	Advantages to credit of Massachusetts
Massachusetts	Oct 28	Nov 18	Hlmet Hook	4
Shenandoah	Oct 22	Dec 3 & 4	Sandy Hook	12 days
Alexander	Oct 22	Dec 2	Sandy Hook	13 days
Henry Clay	Oct 23	Nov 26	Sandy Hook	5 days
Columbiana	Oct 23	Nov 30	Do	11 days
St Patrick	Oct 27	Dec 1	New York	11 days
Sea Horse	Oct 13	Nov 27	Boston	18 days

Here, then, is conclusive evidence that the Massachusetts has some considerable superiority, either from her model, her rig, or the skill of her steam.

It is well observed, in the "United States' Nautical Magazine," "Let it be distinctly understood, that we do not call her a steamer, or expect her to make steam-boat speed, except under canvass. Her steam power is strictly auxiliary to her canvass."

Independently, however, of this novel combination of steam and sail, there are so many points of improved construction in the Massachusetts, as to render some description of them interesting to the general reader, as well as to those who are engaged in Transatlantic navigation. These details we have abridged from a communication to a late Number of the Mechanic's Magazine, stated to be "from head-quarters, and in every particular reliable."

The Massachusetts is the first packet-ship of a line to run between New York and Liverpool. She is 161 feet on deck, 31·9 beam, 20 hold, and measures about 701 tons old style; she has a full poop, extending to, and including the main mast; under this are the accommodations for thirty-five passengers.

During the night, powerful lights are kept continually burning at each bow: each illumines a beautiful lens, showing a brilliant light, that may be seen from any vessel within the range of its reflection, at least three miles off in ordinary weather; and the same light, of course, illumines the sailor's quarters. Between the main and mizen masts, in one of the cabins, on each side, are dresses, the same as those forward, so that no vessel can approach her without seeing her lights from every point except her stern.

The bow is very sharp and very beautiful. The angles formed by the cutwater and wood ends have been gradually filled up, which extends the lines of the ship to rabbets in the cutwater, and the cutwater itself is then fashioned to carry the sweep unbroken to a point. A slight concave, opposite the angles filled in, preserves the harmony of the lines, and increases the sharpness of the bow. This filling to a false bow is entirely original. It increases the strength of the vessel forward, and causes less resistance to her speed, against in a short head sea, and as it is carried up to the head, and decked over, it presents a smooth surface, over which the broken water will roll as harmlessly as from the sides. Her bow is more upright, and has more than other ships of her size, and in consequently, stronger. The curve of her cutwater, as it swells outward and forms the head, is very easy and graceful. She has a neatly carved and gilded billet-head, and a carved scroll-work and wreath around the hawse-holes, and the name and title are placed on a panel on the bow. The figure-head is a Her arms and left side, bearing the American shield. Her eyes are lively sharp, and, although she has the proper, wild expression of countenance the size of the stern, yet the latter is so finely finished, and swells so gracefully outward, as to appear comparatively light and easy. In her planksheer there are 84 composition ventilators, the tops of which can at all times be unscrewed when required. Besides these, she has ventilators similar to those in the Cunard steamers, which are made of copper, and operate like wind sails. In case of accident, she is well supplied with boats; besides a large and beautiful long-boat, fitted with masts and sails, she carries two excellent quarter-boats, and two life-boats. Every chain, stool, and settee, has its air-tight apartments under them, so that in the event of a person falling overboard, one of these thrown to him would be a complete life-buoy.

She spreads the same quantity of canvass as she would have if a sailing vessel alone, and she is modelled and equipped precisely as a sailing packet should be. She spreads the same surface of canvass as the Paul Jones, a ship of 680 tons, which ship has two feet more depth of hold, and a foot more beam than the Massachusetts, but is 15 feet less in length. A suit of the Massachusetts standing sails contains 3833 yards, each cloth 22 inches wide.

The rig is new; the peculiarities of it are, that all the masts are "fidded" abaft the lower mast head, that the lower mast heads are longer than usual, and that the sails are divided into smaller pieces.

One of the great advantages which is anticipated from this rig is, that the ship may be kept more steadily on her course than with the old rig, where it is very often necessary to luff and bear away a little to enable the men to reef or take in sail, or to prevent the large surfaces from being rent to ribbons; indeed, no one who has crossed the Atlantic in the winter can fail to appreciate the value of this rig, struck with the advantages in this respect, as well as in the wear and tear.

Such is the Massachusetts as a ship; we will now look at her as a steamer.—Her motive power consists of a condensing engine with two cylinders, which work nearly at right angles, each 3 feet stroke and 26 inches diameter. There are two boilers, named "waggon boilers," each 14 feet long, 7 wide, and 9 high, with a furnace to each boiler. For the purpose of raising steam quickly, there is a blowing engine and blower; there is also a heater, on the same principle as that applied to the U. S. steam-frigate, Princeton.

Her engine-room is entirely ventilated, and every way protected against the contingency of fire. Its floor is of cast-iron. Her steam power is applied to an Ericsson propeller, the extreme diameter of which is 9½ feet. The shaft passes close to the stern post on the larboard side, and rests in a socket which is embedded and bolted to the stern post, and is further supported by a massive brace above. The propeller is made of wrought copper and composition metal, and can be raised out of the water when the steam power is not required.

The apparatus by which this is effected consists of a shaft which passes from the engine-room through the stern, above and parallel to the shaft of the propeller. The mechanism of the upper shaft, set in motion, revolves and thus raises the propeller out of the water and places it close against the flat of the stern, where it is secured with chains from either quarter. The whole process can be executed in a very few minutes. When this is done, she is a complete sailing ship, in every particular.

The machinery was made by Messrs. Hogg and Co., of New York, agreeably to the plans and drawings of Captain Ericsson, of whose conjunctive ability as an engineer all trans-hes another honourable example.

A "week's month," or opening, is cut across the backing of the rudder, so that when the helm is put to starboard the water will traverse to the west side of the shaft which extends beyond it. The force of both her engines is estimated at about 170 horse power, and nine statute miles per hour, in smooth water, is the speed expected to be obtained by them, with a consumption of eight tons of anthracite coal per nautical day.

The space occupied by the machinery and its appurtenances in the lower hold is forty-seven feet from the stern post forward, or one-seventh the cube of the whole ship.

The cost of her motive power is about two-sevenths of the cost of the ship herself. Her entire cost has been about £16,000.

The Massachusetts will sail for New York on Thursday, the 15th instant.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 10, 1846.

THE spirit of gain often seizes upon the strangest matters, if it thinks it sees in them anything that may be turned to account. Intrinsic value, though it would seem to be one of the first considerations in an affair of buying and selling, is often the very last; odd enough are the things in which dealings actually do take place, and of which the "prices" may be quoted; but far more strange are the things offered for the chance of finding a customer, the possessors believing devoutly there are no bounds to the acquisitive faculty in Englishmen. The traffic in worthless or repulsive matters with which some public atrocity had become associated, has occasionally reached to so morbid an excess as to require checking by the hand of authority. For the sake of public decency we could wish that authority exercised oftener in cases in which, though there are no feelings excited in sympathy with crime, there is certainly an outrage committed on humanity. There can be no objection to a ship bringing home more articles than the lading for which she is chartered, and occasionally an item that may not be found described in the tariff. But the privilege should not be so far abused as to excite public disgust, which must have been roused by the following advertisement copied from a late number of a leading paper:—

MUMMY on SALE.—For SALE, a MUMMY, from Possession Island. It was buried in guano, and is in perfect state of preservation. A board, which was found over it, gives the date of burial 1790. Apply, &c.

We withhold the reference, in hopes the parties are by this time convinced of the impropriety of the affair, and have given, as they are bound to do, the poor human remains Christian burial. It is evident it is the body of some fellow countryman who died on board the guano vessel, and whose companions committed his corpse to the earth, instead of to the great deep, recording the date of the burial. Why was it disturbed? We hear that the cupidity of the guano crews, which long respected the kind of burial ground that existed at Ichaboe, has at last dug away that also—coveting the dead their shield from the elements. But we have not yet heard that they import the withered bodies of their fellow men as articles of sale. Why is it done in this instance? What is there in the accidental preservation of the frame that entitled the finders to violate the sanctity of the dead? To give it the appellation of a "mummy" is absurd, and a mere attempt to escape the opprobium of selling a dead body, by confounding it with relics that have become objects of curiosity. Even in the exposure of those dusty old Egyptians there is something repulsive, but the pains they took to ward off decay, and to obtrude themselves, as it were, on the eyes of the living, are evident. They intended to be gazed at by all generations, and they enveloped themselves in pictured puzzles, to the end that the curiosity of after ages should be continually excited. They provoke us from their tombs to ask who they were? We seem to seek them less than they seek us; and where such efforts have been made to secure a post mortem existence in the flesh, it appears no intrusion to question the dweller in the shroud as to his secrets. They had a sort of horrid anxiety to be present with the living after their time; they would not accept oblivion, and disliked nothing so much as the repose of the tomb; they provided against it as a grievance evil, insisting on a place at their children's feasts, though unpartaking of the mirth, and only a little less in the way than when alive. We do no outrage, then, to the feelings of the old Egyptian when we encase him in a museum; it is an attention he likes. It is no shock to his feelings to be sold: approving of all that excites an interest in him, he rather prefers its being done by public auction than otherwise. And then the awful gulf of time that has rolled between his existence on earth and ours removes our sympathies from him, and he seems to us rather to have been a dweller in another planet than a fellow habitant of this. By some such reasonings as these we have overcome, as to the real mummy, the natural aversion we feel against all unnecessary and wanton exposure of the sad relics of mortality.

But in the case we have alluded to there is not one thing to palliate the violation of the tomb, and the disgusting conversion of its contents into an article of merchandize. The poor sailor sank far from his home, by that speck in the trackless sea, and his companions laid him in the grave; he sought no exception from the common lot; prepared not for a miserable contest with decay. Why should his body be dragged from the grave and sold as a curiosity? His children or his kindred may be among us and may meet the sellers of their father's corse in the streets! The accidental preservation of the human body from decay has been so often witnessed, and has occurred in so many places, that nothing new can be learned concerning it, and the knowledge would be valueless if it could be gained: our great problem is how to feed the living, not to preserve the dead. Let our captains and sailors bring from every zone all that can be of real actual, interest or advantage to man; but let them leave the grave unrifled, and not violate that respect which all nations pay to the place of the dead. We fervently hope we shall see no more such announcements as that we have thought it might answer some useful purpose to quote. Such things are done sometimes more from thoughtlessness than depravity.

THE facility with which rank can ingratiate itself with the multitude is proverbial; even against many disadvantages, in spite of bad traits of character, acts of violence, nay, often absolute crimes, if there is an affability of manner in the holder of exalted rank, the outward charm will win more than the knowledge of the misconduct will repel. Many are the bad Kings who have been great popular favourites; two of our worst Monarchs live in the national recollection by nothing else but their external demeanour. "Bluff King Hal," was an atrocious monster, of whom we cannot find any good or generous act recorded; and the "Merry Monarch" was a cold, heartless sensualist, false to his friends, and a traitor to his people; yet they became public favourites were what is called popular. But we need not be perplexed by the phenomenon; we see daily how readily men make the virtues they wish to find in those they regard as great. No passing tourist can spend five minutes in conversation with a Prince or Potentate, but he immediately warrants him as the possessor of all the good qualities under the sun. The most indifferent person we have lately seen of this disposition to paint all rulers couleur de rose, however murky may really be their moral complexion, is furnished by a letter, published in the Presse, giving an account of the life led at Vernet, in the Eastern Pyrenees, by Ibrahim Pasha, who is residing there for the benefit of his health. As Ibrahim Pasha's real character is too rably notorious, the amazing error of the writer will deceive very few; but to the ordinary one in class, who are thrown into transient personal contact with a Prince, even though he be but a Pasha, and mistakes the exterior courtesies of demeanour, in which all Easterns are proficients, for the presence of the inward virtues. But such notions set afloat on society do infinite mischief, and should be corrected where possible. We gather from the letter that the writer has dined with his Highness; he reads the Moslem at a glance, and settles his character at once, with an offensive flippancy which would astonish us, had we not long ceased to be astonished at anything:—

The disposition of Ibrahim Pasha is excellent, both paternal and amiable, and reminds one of the Patriarchs described in the Bible.

There is no shadow of doubt here! His disposition "is excellent," "paternal and amiable," and "reminds one" of the descriptions of a book, for which, if the writer is a Christian, he should have no such respect to suffer it to be a weight in contact with the name of this most consummate ruffian. Such men are the pests of literature, scattering up and down their false and trashy notions, till the world is full of errors, which it is really wearying to hunt down. Are our readers curious to hear anything of the real character of this paternal and amiable being, this modern type of the Patriarchs? He is a fierce and brutal soldier, stained with all the vices of the camp, and destitute of all the one virtue of the Mamelukes,—temperance. He is boundless in his debaucheries, and it is the repair of a frame shattered by excess that he is now seeking in the south of Europe, while his father, at an advanced age, is still hale and vigorous. The only qualities which are mentioned as distinguishing him favourably are a rude kind of capacity, which has taken a military direction, decision, and personal bravery; there are thousands in his armies who possess the same. He is the mere tool in the hands of the same Mehemet Ali, who planned all the campaigns in which Ibrahim commanded, and established that European discipline in his army which enabled it to gain the mastery in his early conflicts with the troops of the Porte. But his personal qualities are the very reverse of paternal, or amiable, or patriarchal. Lord Byron speaks of the mild manners, and venerable exterior of Ali Pasha; but he did not trumpet him forth on that account, as a model of all the virtues; on the contrary, he made known the ferocious and tiger-like nature that lurked beneath it. But Lord Byron was a man of sense; the adulator of Ibrahim Pasha is one of the thousands who never look beneath the surface.

DEATH OF EARL GRANVILLE.—We regret to announce the death of Lord Granville, which took place on Wednesday, at his house in Bruton-street, Berkeley-square. His lordship had been indisposed for some time. He was of Whig politics, but he was chiefly distinguished for his diplomatic services, for which, indeed, the Earldom was conferred upon him. The last diplomatic post which he held, was that of Ambassador at Paris, but soon after the accession of the Conservative Ministry, he was succeeded by Lord Cowley, the present Ambassador at that capital. Earl Granville was in his 73d year. The date of his creation as such was 1833. The noble Earl's death causes a vacancy for the Borough of [illegible], which was represented by Lord Leveson, now Earl Granville.

THE LATE COLONEL GURWOOD.—Mr C. H. Okey, the half-brother of the late Colonel, has written a letter to the Times newspaper, in which he denies that Colonel Gurwood had lost money by railway speculations, and then proceeds to say, "The cause which induced my brother's untimely death was a wound in the head, which he received from a musket-ball at the storming of Ciudad Rodrigo, where, it is known, he volunteered the forlorn hope; his shako and part of his skull were carried away; and it will be in the recollection of the officers of the 16th Hussars (with whom my brother afterwards served), that, at certain states of the weather he frequently complained of pain in his head; and it at he has been known to fall from his horse, in fainting-fits, in the Riding-house in Brighton. These circumstances, and my brother's long absences from wine, in consequence of the wound, immediately occurred to the recollection of two of his dearest friends, now in Paris, when the account of his melancholy end was received there. It has been observed by some eminent army surgeons, that, 'although Gurwood thought little of the wound in his head, it might some day prove fatal to him;' and, accelerated, probably, by too great mental exertion in the compilation of the "Wellington Despatches," it has done so."

POSTSCRIPT.

THE RATING OF PRINCE ALBERT'S FARM AT WINDSOR

A Vestry Meeting was held at Windsor yesterday, for the purpose of making a rate for the relief of the poor, when a long discussion took place upon the question whether Flemish Farm, in the occupation of Prince Albert, should or should not be subject to a poor's-rate. Ultimately, Mr. Judge moved the following resolution:—

"That this Vestry is still of opinion that his Royal Highness Prince Albert has a beneficial occupation in Flemish Farm; but that, in order that the parish may be guided in their future proceedings in the matter by high legal authority, a case be drawn up by Mr. —, and submitted to Sir Charles Wetherell and Mr. Sergeant Manning for their opinion, to be afterwards submitted to the vestry."

Mr. Hopkins, after observing that he had no doubt a fair and honest statement of all the facts had been laid before counsel for their opinion, moved the following amendment:—"That this Vestry extremely regrets that the resolutions, in reference to the rating of his Royal Highness Prince Albert, passed at the Vestry Meeting, held on the 13th of September last, should have been so carried, inasmuch as this meeting is now fully aware that his Royal Highness is not in any way liable to be rated for Flemish Farm; and that this Vestry deprecates the garbled statements set forth in the public journals on the subject."

Upon a show of hands taking place, and the Chairman's decision being disputed, the names of all present, for and against the amendment, were taken down by the Vestry Clerk, and the result was that it was carried by a majority of two. Three of the parishioners present (Messrs. Alder, Hollis, and Collyer) declined to vote at all.

It was moved by Mr. Noke, seconded by Mr. Cleave (overseers), and carried, "That, inasmuch as the maintenance of the poor presses heavily on the parishioners, a respectful memorial be now presented to his Royal Highness, praying him to take the state of the parish into his gracious consideration; and that such memorial be prepared and presented by the parish officers."

The shaking rate, after considerable altercation, was ultimately agreed to.

DEATH OF THE REV. DR. D'OYLEY.—We have to record the lamented death of the Rev. Dr. D'Oyley, the respected rector of the parish of St. Mary's, Lambeth, which took place on Thursday evening, at his country residence in Sunbridge. The extensive parish of Lambeth will now, we believe, be divided into four distinct parishes.

DEATH OF THE RIGHT HON. ARTHUR MOORE. Died, on Tuesday, at Lamberton Park, in the Queen's County (Ireland), aged 81 years, the Right Hon. Arthur Moore, one of her Majesty's Privy Council, and an ex-Judge of the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL AND THE WHIGS. The Liverpool Mercury of Thursday contains the following article as reference to the late failure of Lord John Russell to form a Ministry:—"We have been favoured with the perusal of a letter, addressed by a personal friend of Lord Grey to a gentleman of this town, which throws some light upon the late movement among the leaders of the Whigs. The statements may be implicitly relied upon. It is not true, as stated, that Lord Palmerston would have taken any post to preserve unanimity, and that Lord Grey would do nothing that was to include Lord Palmerston in the Council. The fact is, Lord Palmerston declared he would not take office on any terms—that Lord Grey refused to relinquish that intended for him to Lord Palmerston, and, if it would smooth matters, to place Lord Palmerston in the Lords and give him the leadership there that his Lord Grey, would most willingly follow him and co-operate in any way whatever; but, that his opinion (and it is not his opinion only, but a very general one) was, that such was the feeling, with respect to Lord Palmerston by some foreign powers, with whom it is essential that we should be on terms of amity, and such the want of cordiality between him and the whole corps diplomatique, in this country that the chances of being involved in war were too great to warrant his appointment to the Foreign Office. Lord Palmerston would accept of no other; upon which, Lord Grey declined to take the responsibility of office On announcing which, Lord John immediately broke up the whole thing. Feeling the injustice of the accusations brought against Lord Grey, and regarding most implicitly on the statement of the proceedings, which I had from himself the day after the break-up, I place the facts in your hands, in order that you may communicate them to the Editor of your leading paper."

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS

FRANCE. The French journals of Wednesday state that the Answer of the Commission to the King's Speech is almost prepared. The discussion upon it will, probably, commence on Monday next. The chief feature in the Paris papers, is the Report of the Minister of Marine on the French Navy.

SERIOUS RAILROAD ACCIDENT IN GERMANY.—A letter from Frankfort of the 3rd says:—"This morning the melancholy intelligence was spread here of a collision between two locomotives on the railway near Manaheim. The number of persons killed or wounded is said to amount to forty.

THE REVENUE.

The Revenue returns for the quarter ending on the 5th JANUARY present gratifying results. It appears that upon the year ending on the 5th instant there was a decrease of £633,350 as compared with the preceding year; and upon the quarter an increase of £26,150. The decrease is, however, to be accounted for in a manner the most encouraging, namely, by the reduction of taxation.

On the year there was a decrease upon—

Customs of	.. ..	£2,278,466
Property Tax	.. ..	163,029
Crown Lands	.. ..	35,000
		£2,473,492

And an increase upon

Stamps	.. ..	540,734
Taxes	.. ..	7,354
Post-Office	.. ..	56,000
Miscellaneous	.. ..	569,611
		1,190,690
		£2,282,802

From this must be deducted the usual increase arising from

Imprest and other Moneys	.. .. ..	£45,806
Repayments of Advances	.. .. ..	603,446
		649,252

Making the net decrease on the year £633,550

The statement for the quarter just concluded is thus made out:—

INCREASE.

Excise	.. ..	£167,867
Stamps	.. ..	190,744
Post-Office	.. ..	43,000
Miscellaneous	.. ..	30,281

Property-Tax	.. ..	100,586
Crown Lands	.. ..	25,000
		477,341

To this must be added the increase on the casual item of Repayments of Advances 183,199

£177,780

And from the product there is a deduction on account of Imprest and other Moneys amounting to 82,675

Leaving as the net increase on the quarter £95,105

MALADY OF THE KING OF HOLLAND.—The public attention having been naturally drawn to the late proceedings at the Hague, it is almost unnecessary to state that the health of the King of Holland is represented to have arrived at such a crisis as to cause the greatest anxiety amongst all classes of his subjects. Amongst the diplomatic circles, the malady under which his Majesty is labouring is so well known, as not to occasion any surprise at the political changes which are thereby produced.

ELECTION FOR HERTFORDSHIRE.—On Thursday Mr. Halsey was returned for the county of Hertford, without opposition, in the room of Viscount Grimston, (now Earl Verulam.)

THE LOST STEAMER, "ST. DAVID." This vessel, about which fears have for some time been expressed, left Havre on the 13th ult., in the evening. The weather at the time was rather moderate, but in the afternoon of the following day the storm commenced. Since that date nothing positive had been heard of the steamer. Several hogsheads of wine, forming part of her cargo, have been picked up, which confirm the probability of her total loss. Relative to the supposition of there being passengers on board, some of those who saw the ill-fated steamer leave Havre report that they observed on her deck about twenty persons, and a portmanteau, containing female apparel, has been picked up off Fecamp. According to the latest accounts, with the exception of the body of the engine-driver, none other of the unfortunate sufferers have been picked up.

ATTEMPTED MURDER AT NOTTINGHAM. On Monday a man of the name of Woodward, a joiner, residing at Wollaton, was examined at Nottingham on a charge of having attempted to murder a woman named Hind, a widow. Wollaton is a village about ten miles from Worksop, and the same distance from Newark and Southwell, and it appears that for a length of time past the prisoner has lived separate from his wife, and has resided with the victim of his attention. Whether he has contemplated for any length of time the horrid deed which he has perpetrated, is uncertain; but it was evidently a premeditated act from the circumstance of his taking with him, on going to bed on Monday night week, a knife, which he placed under his pillow. At half-past six o'clock in the morning, the man and woman quarrelled in bed, when the wretch took the knife and inflicted upon the poor woman a dreadful wound upon her throat, which extended several inches. She instantly jumped out of bed, and ran down stairs screaming "Murder." Alarmed for his safety, the wretch ran away half undressed, while one of their four children, in great haste, alarmed the villagers. A surgeon was sent for, who sewed up the wound. Woodward escaped, but was soon apprehended. The woman being alive, but without hope of recovery, he has been committed to the county gaol for further examination.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

DEPARTURE OF THE COURT FOR CLAREMONT. Her Majesty and the Prince Consort, accompanied by their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal, left Windsor Castle on Tuesday afternoon, at half-past two o'clock, in a close travelling carriage and four, escorted by a detachment of the 2nd Life Guards, for Claremont. Major-General Wemyss and Colonel Seaverke, Equerries in Waiting to her Majesty and the Prince, followed in another of the Royal carriages and four. In the third carriage were their Royal Highnesses Prince Alfred and the Princess Alice, and the Dowager Lady Lyttelton, in attendance upon the Royal infants. Lord Rivers (Lord in Waiting), Viscountess Jocelyn (Lady in Waiting), Mr. J. E. Anson, and Colonel Bowles, followed in the fourth carriage, in attendance upon the Queen and the Prince. It is not expected that the Court will prolong its stay at Claremont beyond Tuesday next.

On Wednesday morning her Majesty and her Royal Consort took their accustomed walk in Claremont-park. Prince Albert afterwards went out shooting, attended by Mr. George Edward Anson and Colonel Bouverie.

Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal were taken out on ponies in Claremont-park early in the forenoon

WINDSOR, Thursday Evening. (From our own Correspondent.) In consequence of the new arrangement for the issuing of tickets (signed by the Lord Chamberlain) which are now only to be procured in London, for the viewing of the State apartments at the Castle, being found to be extremely inconvenient to the public residing away from the metropolis, it is expected that an alteration will speedily take place, so that tickets may be procured in Windsor, as well as in London. Several parties have arrived in the town, since the new arrangement came into operation on the 1st inst., for the express purpose of visiting the State apartments, but they were necessarily disappointed in consequence of being unprovided with tickets, and there being no place in Windsor where they could be obtained. The abolition of the fees for viewing the State rooms, by command of her Majesty, appears to have given universal satisfaction. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent took an airing this morning in a carriage and four, attended by Lady Fanny Howard. The Court is expected to return to the Castle on Tuesday next.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH.—The Duke of Buccleuch, the Lord President elect of the Council, is understood to have obtained an accession of £25,000 per annum to his Grace's large rent-roll, by the recent demise of his uncle, Lord Montagu.

PROJECTED MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE. A matrimonial alliance will shortly be solemnised, between Mr James Duff, M.P., eldest son of General the Hon. Sir Alexander Duff, and the Lady Agnes Hay, second daughter of the Earl and Countess of Erroll. The bride has not yet attained her seventeenth year. Mr. Duff is her presumptive to the Earldom of Fife

CHAPTER OF THE ORDER OF THE GARTER. Her Majesty will hold a Chapter of the Order of the Garter, at Windsor Castle, on Monday, the 19th instant, at half-past two o'clock

KNIGHT GRAND CROSS OF THE BATH.—The Earl of Liverpool was invested by her Majesty on Saturday at Windsor with the insignia of a Civil Knight Grand Cross of the Bath.

GRAND CHESS MATCH IN AMERICA.

TWO years since we had the satisfaction of announcing the success of our countryman, Mr. Staunton, in his great scientific encounter with the French Chess Champion, M. St. Amant; a victory which transferred to England, for the first time, the sceptre that had been successively wielded by Spain, by Italy, and France, for the last three hundred years. We have now the gratifying task of recording the opening games of another match, no less auspicious in its beginning than the former, in which the opposing parties are likewise an Englishman and a Frenchman. The competitors on the present occasion, Mr. Staunton and M. Rousseau, have been trained respectively in the same schools as their predecessors, Mr. Staunton and M. St. Amant, the former having belonged to the celebrated Chess Club of London, where, prior to his having England, he had acquired the reputation of a most promising and brilliant player, and the latter having long been an habitué of the Cercle des Echecs, in Paris; in points of practice and the general knowledge of the game, they may be considered, therefore, equal; it remains for the contest now pending to decide their relative powers of reflection, forethought, combination, nerve, &c. &c.

The two first games appeared in our late edition of last week.

* To avoid the heaviness and monotony which are supposed to characterise the "King's Pawn one," or "close game," it was stipulated, we believe, that both parties should play "K's Pawn two" at the first move.

† The best rejoinder to White's move, considered in Haydeheart and Jaenisch.

‡ Playing the Q's Kt over to this side, when the adverse King has Castled with K's Rook is a favourite manœuvre of our best players in the present day.

§ White gains this move, at least, by the exchange of pieces

‖ "K R P one," in our opinion, would have been much better play.

¶ Now, the grave fault Black committed in allowing the adversary's B to be posted at K B 5th sq is strikingly apparent.

 This is very finely played, and is an instructive example to young players of the importance of gaining time at Chess. Had White paused in his attack to recover the lost Bishop, the adversary must have succeeded in dislodging one or other of the pieces by which he is beleaguered, or in bringing his own forces to the rescue, and then have ultimately retrieved the game.

†† And that after twenty moves only, terminated the opening game of this long-talked of match. Lengthened comment upon a struggle so feeble and short-lived is needless with the exception of White's concluding moves, it presents no points of mark and interest whatever, and would suffer greatly in comparison with most of the published games of these amateurs played under ordinary circumstances.

19. Q to K Kt 3rd	Kt to R 4th		Kt to Q B 6th †

* By Castling now White appears to have thrown away all the advantage this opening gives to the first player. The correct move is Q B's P one.

† We should prefer playing Pawn to K B's 4th at this stage.

‡ In his apprehension of the threatened advance of Black's K B's P, White seems to have quite overlooked the more dangerous advance of his Kt to Q 5th.

§ It was impossible, we believe, to save both the Pawns.

‖ Had Black played on his R's Pawn instead of moving the Kt, White would probably have taken the P at Q B's 6th with his Bishop.

¶ The beginning of the end! White's last few moves afforded his active opponent time to accumulate a force upon the King's quarters, which is quite irresistible

 Properly played; if the Kt is taken, Mate follows in three moves.

†† In this game White makes a longer if not a better fight than in the preceding one; but the play is certainly below the ordinary standard of the games. Neither party, indeed, as yet seems to have "warmed to his work" after a few more games we shall have both upon their mettle, and then some play worthy of themselves and the occasion may be looked for.

Up to the hour of going to press, no farther information on the subject of this contest has reached us; we have only, therefore, to present the third game, which we mentioned last week as having been won by Mr Stanley.

* The opening is played on both sides with care and earnestness.

† Q to her 2nd would have been better play, we believe

‡ He might have opened a smart attack with his cavalry by taking off the adverse Kt, but he probably feared to lose his Q to Pawn.

§ We see no just cause or impediment why K Kt P should not have been thrown forward two squares; with the object of winnaning the Kt. If Black had thus attacked the Kt, White might have played the other Kt to K B 5th, upon which K B P must have been played, and the game would have resolved itself into many perilous and interesting situations

‖ Again it strikes us that the K Kt P might have been played on the Kt

¶ In a contest of such importance it is right to assume that every position underwent a rigid scrutiny; and we doubt not that M. Rousseau had good reason for not advancing the K B P on the two pieces, although the objection is not at the moment evident to us

 Had he taken the R P, White would have moved his R to Q R square, and the result would have been merely the exchange of two pawns.

†† Very prettily played.

‡‡ There is more solidity and purpose in this game than in the two preceding ones; and we look forward with increasing interest to the arrival of the next despatches, which we expect will show a still more marked improvement in the play of both the combatants

THE NEW ROYAL EXCHANGE IMPROVEMENTS. The ancient church of St Bene't Fink, Threadnr. Le-street, the steeple of which, was taken down some time ago, will be removed in a few weeks for the purpose of having the approaches enlarged to the New Royal Exchange. The sale of the materials has been directed by order of the Commissioners.

THE SHIP "TORY."—This vessel, which has been the theatre of so many alleged atrocities, and on board of which such fearful and revolting scenes of blood and massacre are said to have been enacted, having discharged her rich cargo of silks, teas, &c., estimated at £30,000 value, cleared out last week for the West Indies, import duty, and is now lying in the Limehouse basin, where she is an object of great curiosity. (In No.186 of our Journal we gave an engraving of the vessel.) The chief attraction is the after cabin, where Captain Johnsone sat when he was said to have cut at Mars, Cone, and the others. It appears to be about ten feet by twelve, slanting upwards about twelve inches, so as to give the person sitting on the bench beyond the table entire command over any person entering. A beam running across, and which compels one to stoop, is marked with several cuts, which appear to have been planed away, and then fresh painted in patches. Owing to the tragic events which have taken place on board, and the superstitious dread which sailors entertain as regards vessels so fearfully signalised, it has been resolved to change the name of the Tory on her arrival at Liverpool, preparatory to a voyage to Singapore.

VIEWS OF THE O'CONNELL PROPERTY IN IRELAND.

(BY OUR OWN ARTIST.)

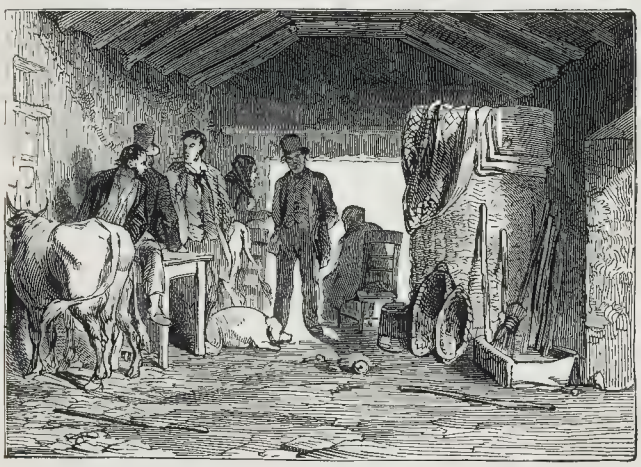
ENTRANCE TO CAHIRCIVEEN.

The great interest excited by the "proven" account of the condition of the tenantry of the O'Connell Estate, by "the Times Commissioner," has induced us to dispatch an Artist to the spot, to sketch the principal localities so vividly described in the above communications. Our Artist's report is almost exclusively graphic; but, he has appended to his sketches a few pencil notes, of which we avail ourselves.

"The Times Commissioner," our Artist tells us, "is in the mouths of all here, from the car-driver to the landlord, and from him down to the humblest labourer's child in the country." Commencing at Cahirciveen, he sends us a sketch of the town, from the Killarney entrance, which shows it to be rather picturesque.

"The scenery about the coast of Cahirciveen," says "the Commissioner," "is magnificent. Beautiful as are the Lakes of Killarney, they are eclipsed by Dingle Bay. Were there any means of comfortable travelling and accommodation, there can be no doubt that this coast would attract many visitors and much wealth.

"The wretched-looking town of Cahirciveen, its dirty, neglected streets, and old hat mended windows, reminds me of another subject.



INTERIOR OF CLUVANE'S HUT.

The property of this town is rented to Mr. Daniel O'Connell, who, as a middleman, sublets it to its present tenants, and extracts a profit rent out of it. In this country they pluck the geese alive, for their feathers, and turn the poor pen-feathered and wretched birds loose, to get over it as they can. This is repeated several times in a year. As if apprehensive of their coming fate, as each goose is caught, to go through the plucking operation, the whole flock, after the manner of geese, set up a terrible cackling, and screeching, and hissing.

"At and in the neighbourhood of Cahirciveen and Derrynane, Mr. Daniel O'Connell possesses an income from land of about £3000 a-year. A small portion of this is his own fee-simple property; another small portion he rents on lease renewable for ever; and about two-thirds of the property he holds on terminable leases, under the Dublin College, Mr. Hartop, Mr. Bland, and Lord Cork. He is, in fact, for two-thirds of his property a middleman, living on a profit-rent derived from small tenants. The bulk of this property is held on a lease for his own life. * * * * * * A gentleman named Butler, residing at Waterville, mentions a lease of land, let by his father to the father of Mr. Daniel O'Connell. When old Mr. O'Connell died, there were not twelve tenants upon it; and in 1841, when the land came out of lease (fifteen years afterwards), there were fifty-four tenants upon it. His general character as a landlord or middleman is, that any tenant who applies to him may have leave to erect a cabin where he pleases. He permits subdivision to any extent. This wins a certain degree of popularity; but the land under lease by him is, in consequence, in the most frightful state of over-population. The competition for land is, therefore, intense, and they will offer almost any rent for the most miserable fragment of land. In this condition they are left in a total state of neglect. They have no agricultural schools; no encouragement; none to lead or to guide them; and the poor creatures are left to subdivide their land, and to multiply, and to blunder on, until, in the words of Mr. Keane Mahony, 'their principal feature is distress.'"

Our next View is of Valentia, from Ferry Point, showing the harbour and intended roadstead, should this place be made a packet-station. A railway is projected from the harbour to Wexford. About 300 men are regularly employed in Valencia, in slate-cutting; as usual, an English Company finds the enterprise and the capital: these works are denoted in the sketch by the tall chimney. The entrance to the harbour is indicated by the lighthouse, to the extreme right; the anchorage, by the vessel; in the foreground is the Valentia Hotel, the front of which is shown in another column.

"At Valentia," says the Times reporter, "owing to the energy and kindness of the Knight of Kerry and Mrs. Fitzgerald, there is so much comfort, cleanliness, and industry, that it is scarcely possible to believe one is in Ireland at all—far less, in the most western portion of it. The extensive slate-quarries give ample employment to every able-bodied man on the island. Well-built and roomy cottages are springing up on every side. Mrs. Fitzgerald employs a number of women in the manufacture of linen table-cloths, napkins, flannel, &c.; and has succeeded in procuring the establishment of a national school, which is attended daily by nearly 300 children. The flax is grown, scutched, spun, woven, and finished, in its various forms, on the island. Mangold-wurzel and green crops have been successfully grown by the Knight, and are coming into favour with the farmers.

HOTEL AT CAHIRCIVEEN.

"The country in this district consists of rugged hills, more or less rocky, surrounding extensive tracts of land, which at present, from the want of the most trifling attention to drainage, produce nothing but turf, but might, by a little outlay of time, labour, and capital, be made to bear the finest green crops. The hill-sides, being drained of their surface water by their natural declination, are generally selected for the habitations of the peasantry, though infinitely less fertile than the valleys and plains beneath. The land is divided into straggling fields, scratched into 'lazy-beds' for potatoes. The cottages are generally huddled together in irregular clusters of from five to ten or fifteen.

"Immediately at the sea-shore of the main-land, opposite Valentia Island, lies the townland of Rynard, containing about 50 families, held by Mr. O'Connell, under Trinity College, on the usual renewable lease.

"Although the great majority of the houses on this property are in a wretched condition—without windows or chimneys, ill-thatched and filthy, surrounded by cesspools and semi-liquid manure—it is to be observed, that signs of improvement are visible, in the erection of several substantial stone-cottages with slate roofs, &c., by the tenants, who are furnished, according to the usual custom, with lime, slates, and wood, by the landlord. The system of agriculture, as shown by the condition of the fields, seems very bad, although the sea-shore, lying close to the farm, offers great advantages in affording the best manure for the improvement of the land."

From Valentia to Derrynane, you pass through the dirty little town of Waterville, with a good road-side hotel, on the property of Mr. Butler. Our artist has sketched this wretched place, for, he says, "its recollection will gladden the hearts of all your Irish piscatorial friends. From Waterville to Derrynane is but a short drive, over an exceedingly good mountain road, through Mr. O'Connell's property; he cannot, however, say that he is lord of the soil, but of the rocks and boulders. Mr. Butler has made considerable exertions to improve the condition of his property here, though there are some wretched hovels on part of his land." "Here," says the Times reporter, "Mr. Maurice O'Connell M.P., was awaiting my arrival, and in company with him and your Commissioner, I proceeded in his carriage to visit that portion of his father's property in the more immediate neighbourhood of Derrynane Abbey. Before we left Waterville, Mr. O'Connell, addressing two or three persons in the crowd which were about his carriage, asked them several questions, the result of which was, the persons addressed declared that Mr. O'Connell was a good easy landlord, and had reduced their rents in the lands of Bastlkann and Inchies."

CLUVANE'S HOUSE.

Here is the Commissioner's report of the drive to Derrynane:—"At one townland (Ardcara), the wretchedness of which on my former visit had struck me, at my request we stopped and entered the cottages. This townland Mr. O'Connell holds on a lease for his own life under Mr. Bland, and sublets it as a middleman. The condition of the huts was perfectly horrible. In one of them, into which we all entered, in the presence of Mr. Maurice O'Connell, I requested your reporter to note down that a broken iron pot was the only furniture of any description in it. The cottage was full of stifling peat smoke, and a woman, clad in rags, with four or five half-naked children about her, was squatted on the mud floor near some smouldering turf. The excuse here was, that she was a pauper, and paid no rent. We entered six or seven cottages here all nearly the same; in some there was a turf-basket or two, in some a table. This constituted the only difference among them."

VALENTIA HOTEL.

WATERVILLE.

Next is a fine View of Derrynane from the road. We must, however, quote "the Commissioner" in the locality:—

"I entered several of the cottages at a place called Derrynane Beg, within a mile from Derrynane. The distress of the people was horrible. There is not a pane of glass in the parish, nor a window of any kind in half the cottages. Some have got a hole in the wall for light, with a board to stop it up. In not one in a dozen is there a chair to sit upon, or anything whatever in the cottages beyond an iron pot and a rude bedstead with some straw on it; and not always that. In many of them the smoke is coming out of the doorway, for they have no chimneys. In one that I entered the door was taken off the hinges and made a table of, by placing it on two turf-baskets. Unaided, and unguided, the poor creatures are in the lowest degree of squalid poverty I have yet seen, and this within sight of Derrynane House. As one of the tenants told me 'they were eating one another's heads off, and if they did not get some assistance they would starve and the gaols would be full.' Wretched as are the tenants on the Marquis of Conyngham's property in Donegal, their condition is fully equalled by the condition of the tenantry of Derrynane."

Again:—"We drove on to Derrynane Beg. We entered it by a bridle path for horses. Down this path a mountain stream was running ankle deep, and by this road we made our way, jumping from stone to stone, and sometimes compelled to wade to the much reputed Derrynane Beg. The cottages are built in clusters of two and three together—a dung-heap always beside each, over which we had generally to scramble to get into the door. We entered several of these cabins, some inhabited by tenants, and others by labourers. In their general description the cabins are thatched with potato tops, with flat stones and sods piled on the thatches to mend them and keep them down; the doorways are narrow and about four feet and a half high; the windows of such cottages as had them are about eight inches by ten, without glass, and stopped up by boards; many are without any hole for a window at all; a cow, or a pig, was usually inside, and half a dozen children; the cottages inside were almost invariably quite dark and filled with smoke, which found its way out of the doorways; and our inspection was carried on by means of lighted splints of bog timber, lighted at the turf fire on the mud floor, the dull red glare of which through the thick smoke on half-naked children, pigs, cows, filth, and mud, was such a picture as I cannot draw. This is the condition of the tenantry of Derrynane Beg."

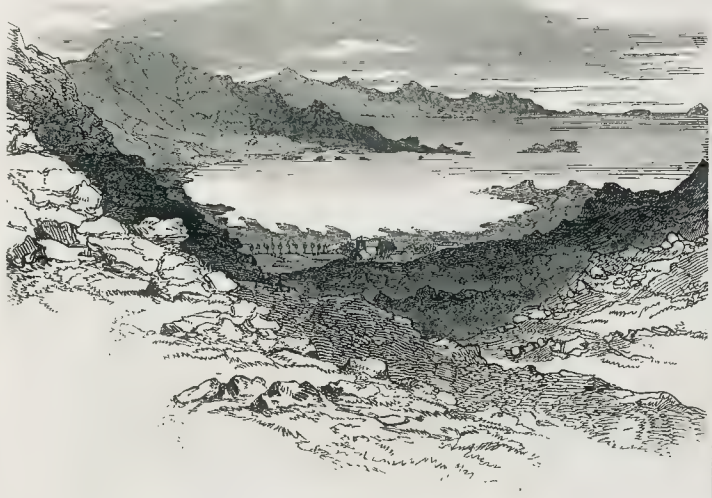
Our Illustrations close with the exterior of Cluvane's Hut, on Mr. Hartop's property. This is but an average specimen of the Kerryman's cottage. "I have written to you," says the Times' Commissioner, "in former letters, much about miserable hovels in other parts of Ireland; they are more than equalled in Kerry. I have described the half-naked and potato-fed people I have met with elsewhere; here their nakedness is not less, and they know no other food. In filthiness and squalid poverty, starving on a rood of land with miles of waste land around him, which the application of knowledge and industry would make teem with plenty, the poor Kerryman exists in contented wretchedness. In a hovel like a pigstye, without chimney and without window, with but one room, an iron pot, and a rude bedstead, with some straw litter, as the only furniture, bed, or bed-clothes, the labourer, in the midst of half a dozen nearly naked children, with his barefooted wife, sits squatted on the mud floor round the peat fire. A garden plot of potatoes are their whole subsistence; and for this patch of land, and the hovel which shelters him and his family, his labour is sold to some farmer, who lets him his land for a year."

As a corroborative summary, the reporter says of the condition of the Derrynane tenantry:—

"There are no glass windows, and the people seem to be in much distress. There is no mangold-wurzel grown there. There are no green crops visible; there are no agricultural schools, nor instructors. With the exception of the free school at the Abbey, and one at Cahirciveen, I could not discover that there were any means of educating the children on the estates of Mr. O'Connell that I visited. The only plantations I saw were the trees round Derrynane. The people in general seem quite ignorant of the merest rudiments of agriculture; draining is quite neglected, and subsoiling a thing unknown. The cattle I saw were of a very bad description. To use the words of Lord Devon's report, the agricultural labourer on Mr. O'Connell's estate is 'badly housed, badly fed, badly clothed, and badly paid,'—and the only food of his tenantry is the potato. Their cabins are seldom a protection against the weather; a bed or a blanket is a rare luxury, and nearly in all their pig and manure-heap constitute their only property."

If it be asked how such a state of things has so long existed without being exposed, we may reply in the words of "the Commissioner:"—

"The county of Kerry, westward of Killarney. To Killarney the tide of English tourists sets in, to visit its far-famed lakes. The continual want of decencies and comforts has, at length, secured them; and but little is to be observed amongst the people there to distinguish them from the inhabitants of every other tourist's resort. There is the same eager pouncing on a stranger as a prize whom it is fair game to pluck; the same excess of civility and not a whit less of extortionate exaction. These are the excrescences which luxury and the careless spending of wealth usually create. Westward, however, of Killarney, but few visitors journey. There is no commerce, an infinitely subdivided and pauper tenantry, who (excepting a little butter, which they manufacture to pay their rents,) create nothing beyond their consumption. The planting of potatoes and the churning of butter, bounds their knowledge; the selling of a firkin of butter a-year to some Cork merchant is the extent of their intercourse with the rest of the world. Here, then, we may expect to find all the peculiarities of the Irish character strongly marked, and their habits still after their own hearts; and we do find them."



DERRYNANE ABBEY.

THE LATE FIRE IN CRIPPLEGATE.—On Thursday, George John Ford, a printer, was indicted for feloniously setting fire to certain premises in his occupation in Grahms-buildings, Beech-street, Cripplegate, with intent to defraud the Imperial Insurance Company. The fire, which took place on the 7th of December, excited some interest at the time, and led to an inquiry. The Jury acquitted the prisoner; and Mr Clarkson abandoned another indictment against him.

BRITISH MUSEUM.—This National Institution re-opened yesterday, the 9th inst., having been closed some days, as usual, after the Christmas holidays The models of the Parthenon, purchased of Mr. Lucas, were then for the first time, exhibited to the public. One of them represents that noble structure in its present ruined condition; and the other the sculptor's idea of its appearance in the days of its pristine splendour. Models of this description have long been wanting in the collection to illustrate the position those matchless prizes, known as the Elgin Marbles, occupied in their original glorious resting-place. The interest o the casual or uninformed spectator in these wonderful works of art will be greatly increased by the admirable keys thus afforded him; which are of no contemptible size, being 12ft. by 6. In our next week's Number, we shall engrave this classical restoration.

PROMOTION FROM THE RANKS AND REWARDS FOR GOOD SERVICE.—A warrant has been promulgated by command of her Majesty, for the purpose of affording "a greater encouragement to the non-commissioned officers and soldiers of the army who may have distinguished themselves, or who may have given good faithful, and efficient service." It is dated Windsor, Dec 19, and is comprised in 14 articles, by the first of which it is provided that whenever her Majesty shall sanction the grant of a commission with or purchase to a non-commissioned officer, selected and recommended for this distinction by the Commander-in-chief, there shall be granted to such officer, in lieu of an outfit as a commissioned officer, a sum of £150 if appointed to a cavalry regiment, and £100 if to an infantry regiment. Subsequent articles provide that a sum not exceeding £2,000 per annum be distributed in such sums, if not above £20 each, to sergeants who may be distinguished for merit, good conduct, on the recommendation of the Commander-in-chief. Under the denomination of "good conduct pay," a progressive increase of one penny per day, up to sixpence, and certain honourable distinctions, are also appointed to be given, under specified regulations, to soldiers who shall have completed ten, fifteen, twenty, twenty-five, or thirty years of actual service.—The remaining articles are occupied in detailing the regulations under which these gratuities, good conduct pay, &c, shall be forfeited or restored.

MUSIC.

THE LECTURE HALL, GREENWICH

MR. WALLACE AS A VIOLINIST.—Upwards of a thousand hearers were assembled at the Third Classical Subscription Concert, given on Wednesday night, attracted by a programme, of which, the first appearance in this country of Mr Wallace the pianist, and composer of "Maritana" as a violin player, was the prominent item. His début was quite triumphant. His style bears a marked resemblance to that of De Beriot—there is the same breadth of tone, and earnest expression. In the executive department, he accomplishes all the trying mechanism of the Paganini school, although it was evident, from the symptoms of fatigue evinced by the performer, that he is not in his full practice. But in feeling the grand quality of a musician he cannot be surpassed. His player, twice: the first time a theme with variations, with an introduction of his own composition; and lastly, with Benedict, a concertante duet for piano and violin, on motifs, arranged by De Beriot and Osborne, from Rossini's "William Tell." In the latter piece, he achieved his great success. His tenor part of the celebrated trio, in which Arnold is informed of his father's death, produced the most powerful effect, so intense was the passion that Mr. Wallace drew from his violin, a most difficult instrument. The applause at the close was unbounded. Benedict, who accompanied the vocal selection, also displayed himself by brilliant execution and consummate taste. The vocalist in was of a superior order: Miss Dolby (Lady Chatterton) introduced Weber's Scena from "Der Freischutz," was duly appreciated; and in the graceful duet with Madame P. Labache, "Like the storm now died away," from Benedict's "Brides of Venice," and in Carnovani's pastoral air, "She is mine," the German prima donna maintained her fame. Madame F. Labache, with her usual earnestness, gave Wallace's song, "Scenes that are brightest," and Benedict's "By the sad sea wave" charmingly. In her duet with Signor F. Labache, the popular "Serza tanti complimenti" of Donizetti, the demand for a repetition was a matter of course. The young bagfo was called upon to sing Rossini's "Tarantella" and "Mei rampoli" trios, but for the latter he substituted the "Largo al factotum," which was high-y relished. Mr. Wetherbee, a pupil of the Royal Academy of Music, sung Wallace's "Hear me, gentle Maritana" with taste. He has a fine voice, and bids fair to be a most useful basso. Mr Carte, who was the director of this excellent concert, executed a duet with Mr. Rockstro, his pupil, on two Boehm flutes, to the satisfaction of the auditory. Mr. Wallace is composing an opera for Italy, and will leave London shortly for Naples, to return in May.

SACRED CONCERTS.

The third Concert of Sacred Music, under Miss Mounsey's direction, at Crosby Hall, was very well attended, the organ solo of the lady affording great satisfaction. The scheme opened with Weldon's Anthem "In thee, O Lord," a fine work, worthy of the fame of Henry Purcell's favourite pupil. Weldon was born in Chichester, and was organist of the Chapel Royal, St. Bride's, and St. Martin's. He died in 1736, and Dr. Boyce was his successor at the Chapel Royal. Dowland's Chorus, "O God of Power" has a beautiful melody, and is rich in harmony. Dowland was born in 1562. He was a great performer on the lute, and Shakspeare made him the subject of one of his sonnets, "If music and sweet poetry agree." Dowland wrote some elegant Madrigals, and is styled by Anthony Wood as the "rarest musician that the age did behold." He died in Denmark, about the beginning of the seventeenth century. The above Chorus was written in honour of Queen Elizabeth. The name of Otto Nicolai also figured in the programme. There are some Goten Nicolais, but the clever Otto, "All hail, golden arch," sung by Miss Rainforth and Mr. Machin, was written by the Berlin composer, born in 1809, who is still alive, and is now in Vienna. A trio, by the celebrated Hasse, "To thee, all bounteous Father," is a gem. We ought to have more of his works. He was born in 1699, near Hamburg, and was a pupil of Scarlatte Hasse; was the star of Europe at one period, and was contemporary with Handel. He wrote an Italian opera in 1733, for London, for the famous Farinelli, called "Arsaces," which ran forty nights. Hasse was the most voluminous composer of his age. He died in Venice, in 1783, in his 84th year. He was the husband of the celebrated Faustina Bordoni, who invented a new mode of singing by running divisions, with extraordinary facility, and was remarkable for her sustaining power. Preyer and Rucken are two modern German composers, the "Daughter's Prayer" of the former, and the "Maid of Judah" of the latter, were well sung by Miss Rainforth and Miss Steele. The last-mentioned vocalist was encored in Handel's "O Lord whose Mercies," from "Saul," as was also Sphor's duet with Miss Rainforth, "Repose." Mendelssohn's overtures, "Trust in God," "Lieht," introduced last season, were rather unevenly sung. The remainder of the scheme contained well known pieces of the great masters.

THE BROTHERS HILMSBERGER

The two sons of the Leader of the Imperial Theatre Band, at Vienna, will visit London this season. The eldest is sixteen years of age, and is a first-rate violinist; the youngest plays on the same instrument, but displays also great aptitude for composition. The brothers perform together beautifully in concertante duets. On the 21st of December Mendelssohn's new Violin Concerto was executed by the elder Hulmsberger, at the Conservatoire Concert. We noticed this concerto in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of December 27, in our remarks on Herr Kreutzer's performance at Mr Lincoln's Evenings with the Great Composers, under the disadvantage of a pianoforte accompaniment. Mr. Ella, of the Musical Union, who heard it at Vienna, thus describes this great work:—"Like the pianoforte concertos of Mozart and Beethoven, the orchestral accompaniments are so charming as fairly to divide the attention of the audience between the solo and the instrumentation. It struck me that the genius of the solo instrument was not favourably developed in variety of bowing passages, yet the excellence and novelty of the composition excited much interest. The youth, Hulmsberger, had the honour of sharing with the composer the suffrages of an audience consisting nearly 5000 persons. The great violoncellist, Menter, from Munich, is spoken of as an addition to the stars that will appear among you very shortly."

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

The final performance of Handel's "Messiah" was given at Exeter Hall, on Friday night; the singers, as on former occasions, being Mrs. Sunderland, Miss Hawes, Messrs. Hobbs and Phillips. The oratorio of "Solomon" will be the next in rotation.

MADAME OURY.

The annual concert of this accomplished pianiste at Brighton will take place this morning (Saturday), at the Old Ship Assembly Room; the singers being Madame F. Labache, Miss Isabel Fleet, Mr. Wilson, and Signor F. Labache. M. Oury having been called to the Continent, to fulfil an engagement, Signor Sivori has been engaged as violinist.

GENTLEMAN'S CHORAL CONCERT.

The annual choral meeting of this spirited Society, at Manchester, was on Thursday night, Sir George Smart officiating as Conductor; this professor, although he has resigned the management of town concerts, keeps up his provincial engagements. Mr Seymour is the leader of the band, in which a son of the patriarch Linley is first violoncello. The vocal performers were Madame Caradori Allan, the Misses Williams, Mr. Lockey, pupil of Sir G. Smart, and Mr Robinson, from Dublin, a basso. The selection was from the classical masters. One curious regulation is, that after the audience has returned to the hall, when the pause at the end of the first part for refreshment is over, the doors are locked, so that the performance may not be interrupted by persons leaving the room.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

Great alterations will be made in the orchestra next season. All the chorus singers will be placed at the back, and the principal vocalists in front of the conductor. Signor Costa has received full powers from the directors over the members of the band, a desideratum long required.

JULLIEN'S CONCERTS.

Signor Sivori's engagement at Covent Garden Theatre was in fulfilment of a contract for three months for £1000. M. Jullien has found it very profitable. How far it may prove so eventually to M. Sivori is another question; for after he has been heard for a shilling, it is not likely that amateurs will pay half a guinea for a similar luxury at the customary concerts of the season.

MADEMOISELLE JENNY LIND.

We announced some time since, that this great vocalist would not sing in English at Drury-lane Theatre. It is now doubtful whether she will come at all to this country, as she has written to Mr. Bunn, requesting the cancelling of the engagement she had signed with him for 90 representations in May or October, 1845. The Lessee of Drury-lane Theatre, however, has replied to the Swedish Nightingale that he will insist on the performance of the agreement, and threatens her-not only with an action for damages, but an injunction in London, but with an appeal to the King of Prussia on his behalf, as he had incurred considerable trouble and expense in going to Berlin to engage her, and he had signed her own conditions. The report in the daily papers that she had engaged with Mr. Lumley is contradicted by the Morning Chronicle, which publishes a letter from Jenny Lind herself, who declares, on her word of honour, that "the affair of Drury-lane" would prevent her from appearing at the Italian Opera House, and pleads her utter incapability to acquire the English language as her reason for not keeping faith with Mr Bunn. She is now singing in Berlin with such success that every night fights take place at the door for admittance, crowds waiting many hours for the first rush. We published a Memoir and Portait of Jenny Lind in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of Oct. 11.

DRURY-LANE THEATRE.—The opera of "Don Quixote," by Macfarren, and of "The Crusader," by Benedict, are now in rehearsal. The former will be produced first, after the run of "Macbeth."

THE NEW PLANET.—Mr. Wyld, of Charing-cross, has just issued "The Path of the New Planet, Astræa;" as seen in an inverting Telescope; the Stars from B.A. 7 ones; the Planets' places by the Hour. This early publication will be peculiarly acceptable to our astronomical readers.

THE NELSON MONUMENT.—The completion of this work has, at length, been determined on by the Woods and Forests; and to this effect a communication has been made to the artists to whom the commissions have been given, through the Earl of Lincoln. The subjects proposed for the four base reliefs are the Victories of Cape St. Vincent, Copenhagen, the Nile, and Trafalgar. All the models are completed by Messrs. Ternouth, Watson, Ward, and Seaward; Mr. Carew, Mr. Tweed, and Mr. Lough. The two lions are by Mr. Lough. The relieved works will be in Bronze, the lions in stone or granite. Many complaints have been lately made of the state in which this truly national monument had been left, and it is most gratifying to find they have been heard in the proper quarter.

THE THEATRES.

HAYMARKET.

On Tuesday evening another version of "The Cricket on the Hearth" was produced at this theatre, with the usual suspensions here these two seasons,—having been prevented, by a domestic calamity, from fulfilling her engagements last year,—when the comedy of "La Femme Jalouse" was produced for her rentree. The moral of this play may be conceived from its title, being similar to that of Colman's "Jealous Wife." It is pointed at wives who, mistrustful of their husband's affections, permit themselves to be carried away by unwarranted and absurd jealousies, until they destroy all matrimonial happiness, and render themselves, and all about them, thoroughly wretched. As a good lesson it is worthy of commendation, but as a dramatic entertainment it fails to effect its purpose: and it was only the exquisite manner in which Madame Albert gave every nuance of the intricate and difficult part of the heroine, which could have rescued it from monotony and tediousness. Passion, hatred, envy, wounded pride, and other necessary causes in these cases, were depicted with terrible truthfulness and feeling; and the mingled outpouring of penitence and affection that bursts from her, when she is shamed of her folly and convinced of her error, and of the injury she has done her husband, was full of the most delicate touches of pathos. M. Lemadre, as the husband, acted with quiet dignity and good expression. M. Cartigny, as the mentor in the piece pursued to cure the wife of her insane curiosity, played with much droll solemnity, and with all the care and finish for which this perfect artiste is distinguished. Mdlles St. Marc and Anna Grave are deserving of some praise for the careful manner in which they filled their trifling rôles. The rest of the characters were sustained very respectably acted. The vaudeville of "La Meunière de Marly" followed

This piece was adapted by Mr. Morton, at Drury-lane, during Mr Macready's management, under the name of "The Village Belle." Mrs. Keeley the part now taken by Madame Albert. The equestrian mistress of the mill, who strives so long to make her dull-headed—or rather her dull-hearted relative, understand that her passion is for her husband, was rendered by her with her usual naïveté and grace in such parts. M. Narcisse, as her nephew, was most amusing, and was encored in a little vaudeville air—evidently to his astonishment. He, however, merited the honour. The reception of Madame Albert was most enthusiastic, and, at the fall of the curtain, she reappeared to receive from the audience the renewed testimonies of their satisfaction.

On Monday, after "La Femme Jalouse," the laughable operetta of "Le Rendezvous Bourgeois" was played, [illegible] two acts. Messrs. Curtis, Norton, and Dumery; Mdlles. St. Marc, and Anna Grave, and Madame Albert, appeared [illegible] the comedy of one convulsive roar of laughter from the beginning to the end. The house was crowded to the ceiling.

The Flying Horse in the burlesque at the LYCEUM, is painted by Mr. Herrin, the celebrated artist. It was first painted black, but it was thought the general effect would be improved were it a white one, and that gentleman accordingly made the alteration, which appears a judicious one.

No novelties are, as yet, underlined in the bills of any of the principal theatres. They are all nightly crowded to the ceilings; so that we presume the managers are perfectly content, for the present, to let the programmes remain unaltered.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Time is like a fashionable host,
That slightly shakes a parting guest by the hand;
But with his arms outstretched, as he would fly,
Grasps the in-comer. Troilus and Cressida.

Amen! say we to the philosophy of the old fellow of servile and hour-glass To "let Lyrones be lyrones," is the canny counsel of a canny people. It is the physical rule of nature, moreover: we were not born to look backwards, nor to go backwards: but its reverence our birthright.

How stands the matter of our text in perspective? The turf in '46 is destined to be a great fact. On Wednesday evening last, its official organ was published, with a stunt-supplement, crammed full of all manner of rich announcements. There was the Newmarket Handicap to be run at the Craven Meeting of that ilk, with upwards of a column of nominations; the Chester Cup, with one hundred and forty-nine subscribers; the St. Leger for '47, with one hundred and forty-six; and the lists of Liverpool, York, and everywhere else, "in a concatenation accordingly." And there is something better, in probability, than even the "Racing Calendar" was enabled to glad the eyes of its readers withal.

It is most likely the season will open as far as regards suburban Olympics with the Spring Meeting on Epsom Downs, early in April, put on the scene in due form. It is supposed that a race, to be called "The Great Metropolitan Stakes," will come off on that occasion: which Rumour states, will be a Derby trial: a race for three-year-olds, Derby weights and course, with some four or five hundred pounds added as a bonus to a small sweepstakes—of which will come, perhaps, a sum total of twelve or fourteen hundred, and certainly a great field of horses—for who would not give ten pounds for such a trial, independent of the chance of winning such a stake? Imagine a Derby trial run at Epsom, early in April! Will the county of Surrey find accommodation for the bodders of tickets in lotteries and sweeps alone? There is store of steeple-chasing as usual in prospect; but steeple-chasing became a national sport yet, whatever it may be when hunting becomes more scarce—and this brings us to matter of considerable and curious interest, which deserves a new paragraph.

According to such data as are available to the journalist, however unpleasant the admission, field-sports should appear to be on their last legs. When lord and lady give place in John Bull's bill of fare to curry-powder and other poppers, it is time to conclude that the day is past for our populace "to sport in fields and lead ambrosial lives." What game is the lover of wonder without hope? Foreseen it—great is Diana of the Ephesians. It is but now, when between railroads and game-laws, and the like evil contrivances, the man who loves his dog and his gun is chidden at his wife's end, that [illegible] the hint that the secret [illegible] dreams of his forefathers. Let him turn to his atlas, if he have one, and there, hard by the Pacific, adjacent to 50 degrees of northern latitude, as well as a district called, if we remember right, Cabbage Garden, behold Parts Unknown." This is now entitled the Oregon Territory—so called by the [illegible] its first discoverers, in consequence of the long ears of the aborigines [illegible]

[illegible] knows the stern determination expressed by the Minister of the [illegible] to the death, our rifle to that territory few know the truly state in which the views and wishes of [illegible] the fact is the secret [illegible] to secure fit and ample hunting grounds for Young England. Lowers, do we not see the mind of the philosopher as well as the friend? In the extensive age—was wordcraft alone to remain "caloric, rumford?" No doubt, it looks a long way on paper to go to cover: California seems, just now, a distant inset, but Heaven sent electric telegraphs to it!

The new grown need of policy and trade;

and can we suppose mankind will much longer be content to crawl to its wherevalboats at sixty miles an hour? The scoffer may make his joke at it, if it please him: but should he continue to read these, our essays on sporting, for another half century, we'll bet him a chop-stick dinner at Pekin, and will find a notice of the operations of the California Clippers.

In every department of our National Sports things are looking up—as they say in the East. In the Autumn there is to be a Royal review of our pleasure marine. Let the regulars look to it! already have our amateurs taught the navy how to build their ships. Jack must keep his eye to windward, or the yacht-men will show him how they ought to be sailed. With such prospects before us, is it to be wondered at we play the fashionable host with the departing season—or with arms outstretched, as we would fly

Grasp the incomer?

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—Matters were rather more lively this afternoon; but still, it must be confessed, very far below concert pitch. The Chester Cup was scarcely mentioned, and although several horses were backed for the two staple events, the prices underwent very little change. Decidedly the most in request were Scott's lot and Breeako for the Derby; and Vanish, Gopsey, and Sister to Flambeau, for the Oaks. The odds quoted underneath do not agree exactly with the business actually transacted, but are governed by the genuine state of the market:

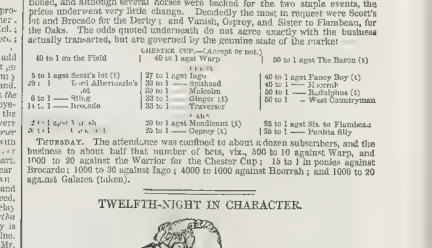
TWELFTH-NIGHT IN CHARACTER.



O! Twelfth Night cometh, and merriment speedeth with it unto the goal of the heart. This we shall see presently by the number of considerations it calleth up.

What now?
Twelfth-night is political—all political.
How political?
Why, it has a great deal to do with the state of Parties!
Yes; Evening parties if you will.
Well, and though it falls out of Parliament yet, in every well-regulated family, there is a Meeting of the House!
And on Twelfth night—
The Queen examineth into the characters of her servants, and in short everybody may have a character.
How?
By joining the levee in the Drawing-room
What is the Drawing-room?
A delightful place where the guests are comfortably quartered, and the characters are properly drawn
Then, if you please, let us at once see some characters properly drawn.
Of course. Here goes.

THE GREAT CHARACTER OF THE GREAT CAKE.

A great Twelfth Cake is now a sign,
So cities say, of a grand design,
Batches are made for twelfth-night play,
And Harper has one by a great R.A.*
For when R A.'s design our food,
We know the drawing must be good;
So cakes which now our board adorn,
Are nothing if they are not drawn,
Quartered, and tasted for a treat,
And then their character's complete.

What is a great cake? Let us see;
A Minister's no cake, not he;
To stick to party 'tis his whim,
As long as party sticks to him;
But good Twelfth Cake is twice as hearty,
Because it goes to every party.

An Author is a great cake when
He grows too sheepish with his pen,
And snarls and growls like any pup
Merely because he is set up.
Cut up a Twelfth Cake as you will,
It only bids you have your fill;
Looks very pleasing when it's handed,
And, if well made, is also ravished.
(* It's Peel is candid through and through,
I wish Sir Robert was, don't you?*)

A great cake is a RAILWAY! What?
What new vagary have you got?
Why look; I take you unawares,
It is dovetail into shares
At once its prospect looks quite nice,
And all are anxious for a slice.
Stags do not seek it, but it cheers
The hearts of many pretty deers.
And look! (What gamblers children are!)
I also see some shares at Par!
Twelfth Cake's a railway, then—surprise!
Mark its directors! Ha! they rise
To drink to its Promoter Sea,
Wine has got up the Company.
While they are quaffing—hip! hip! hip!
The Characters are an easy Scrip;
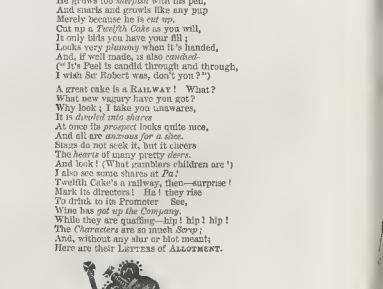
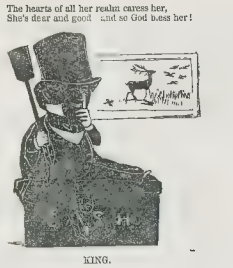
And, without any slur or blot meant;
Here are their LETTERS of ALLOTMENT.



QUEEN.
The little Lady of the State,
Long made by Power and Virtue great,

* See the City Cake in our last

The hearts of all her realm caress her,
She's dear and good—and so God bless her!



KING.

A Mighty Monarch here we sing—
Hudson his name—the RAILWAY KING!
He's got a hundred lines and more,
We've got him into body four.

PRINCE.

The happy Consort who our lady blesses
And Royal Father of two sweet Princesses,
Two boys whose coming still the Nation hails,
And pressing to his heart a Prince of Wales—
Fact. Minister from him this difference feels.
He holds the Wheates they only hold the Seas.

PREMIER.

A person nobby
Called Sir Bobby
Who's got a seat in Place's lobby,
And whom no popular stir or Lurch
Can make give way to Lord John Russell.
They say he's now from night to morn
A reading on the Nation's Corn,
Which John Bull only wants to see (see!)
Without delay—made free and easy!

THE DUKE.

The greatest warrior on the cards 'tis true—
Who played and won unlimited (Water)loo!

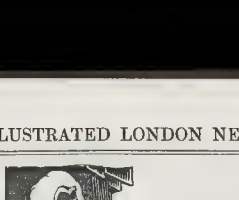
SIR J. MES.

He's content to be Land—he need not roam—
For he's got the Stuff at Home.

WAR.

In Downing street, with diplomatic scars,
Lord Aberdeen crams on British Mars.



CONSCIENCE-KEEPER.

Lord Lyndhurst serves the Queen without a frown,
And keeps her conscience in his wig and gown:
He cannot "call her mine" in legal langle,
But sits in legal ermine, notwithstanding;
And, what is odd, he stays her throne to back,
Altho' they say he's always got the Sack!

GOULBURN.

We hope this gentleman is safely in,
For he has got the charge of all the tin.

Beyond this Chancellor we will not go,
Though many more in the same boat do row,
Raking the State in manner frank or sinister,
And boasting each one of the rank of Minister—
All characters of whom to state 'tis right,
Have got no character to spend TWELFTH-NIGHT.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—Although the fresh arrivals of English wheat since Monday have been but moderate, the demand for that article to-day was heavy, at barely stationary prices, and a clearance was not effected. Free foreign wheat was also dull, yet the last few were firm, and a sale not relaxed to lower rates. The receipts of barley being large the demand was very heavy at, in some instances, a slight depression in the quotations. The supply of malt was pretty well cleared off on much the same terms. Smithfield Market.—With only the supply of beasts on sale here to-day was very limited, the beef trade was in a dull state at barely, but at nothing quotable beneath. Monday's prices. Scarcely a single head of foreign beasts or sheep was brought forward. The numbers of sheep being quite very small, the inquiry for lambs was dull, although Tuesday was somewhat carnivalous. Calves were in short supply and fair request, at late prices. The pork trade was active, and the quotations were well supported. Milch cows sold heavily, at from £16 to £20 each, including their small calf.

ROBT. HARVEY.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

In the English market, during the week, everything has indicated an upward tendency. The fear of the deposit question, coupled with a natural anxiety regarding the political agitation likely to engage Parliament during the next session, has prevented a considerable rise in Consols. The amount of the surplus revenue, arising from the October quarter, to be expended in the purchase of Stock and Exchequer Bills, is £1,314,075 2s. 3d. A large proportion of this is devoted to the paying off of Exchequer Bills, which have, consequently, improved to 2d, 3d. Consols have fluctuated between 94¾ (Monday's prices), and 95⅞, at which price some bargains were done on Thursday. A slight reaction occurred, however, during the day, and notwithstanding this, is rather scarce, the market has declined to 95½ to ⅝ for the Opening. It is more than probable, that the purchases of the Committee on behalf of the National Debt, will be fully balanced by the amount of Stock thrown on the market as soon as Consols are open for transfer. Several large holders, it is known, remained in Consols at the period of closing, instead of changing their Stock for the securities remaining open. Exchequer Bills, on Tuesday was the first day for private transfer, the number that availed themselves was very small. This indicates no tendency to a rise, from a scarcity of Stock. Prices, although quite tolerably firm, are still easily affected by any adverse circumstance, showing a want of general confidence in the prospect of a permanent advance at present. The closing prices of the week will indicate the improvement that has occurred:—Bank Stock, 203; Three per Cent. Reduced, 95⅝; Three per Cent. Consols Annuities, 95⅝; New 3½ per Cents., 99½; Long Annuities to expire Jan 1860, 10 7-16; Ditto 35 years, Jan. 5, 1860, 10¼; India Bonds, £1000, 40s; Bank Stock for Account, 207; Consols for Account, 95⅝; Exchequer Bills, £1000, 1pd.; pm. 3l; Ditto £500, pm 2?, Ditto Small, pm. 2?.

There have been some trifling fluctuations in the Foreign House since last week, but the business in general has been of a limited character. Portuguese advanced on Monday to 59½, and has maintained the quotation with some firmness. Venezuela also improved about one per cent., and closes at 42. Spanish Actives have remained about 29, and the Three per Cents. are good at 35¾ to ⅞ ex dividend. Brazilian is 84, and the New, 78. Buenos Ayres remains 41. Equador has drooped to 3⅞. Mexican improved at the beginning of the week to 31½, but has since gradually receded to 31. Dutch have improved to 61¼ for the Two-and-a-Half per Cents., and 96¾ for the Four per Cents.

The business of the Share Market continues very limited, and prices readily yield to even small sales. At the commencement of the week prices improved; but a large amount of Shares to be sold on limit, immediately presses down the Market when any decided improvement takes place. At the close of the week, French Shares were rather flat, reduced prices coming over from Paris, and the Market was heavy, for nearly every line. Caledonians have receded. Eastern Counties, on the contrary, have improved to 3, and London and York are better. The anticipation that, on payment of the Dividends, a material improvement would take place, does not appear likely to be realised, as the subjoined closing list of prices will demonstrate:—Birmingham and Oxford Junct., 2¾; Bridgwater and Minehead, 3¾ dis.; Bristol and Exeter, 84; Ditto, New, 7¾; Buckinghamshire, 1¾ pm.; Caledonian, 15; Ditto, New, 4; Ditto, Extension, 3¾; Chester and Holyhead, 17½; Direct Northern, 2¾; Eastern Counties, 3; Ditto, New, 8 pm.; East Lincolnshire, 2¾; East and West of England, 1; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 77; Ditto, Half Shares, 16; Edinburgh and Perth, 5; Goole and Doncaster, 9¾; Grt. FINE ARTS.

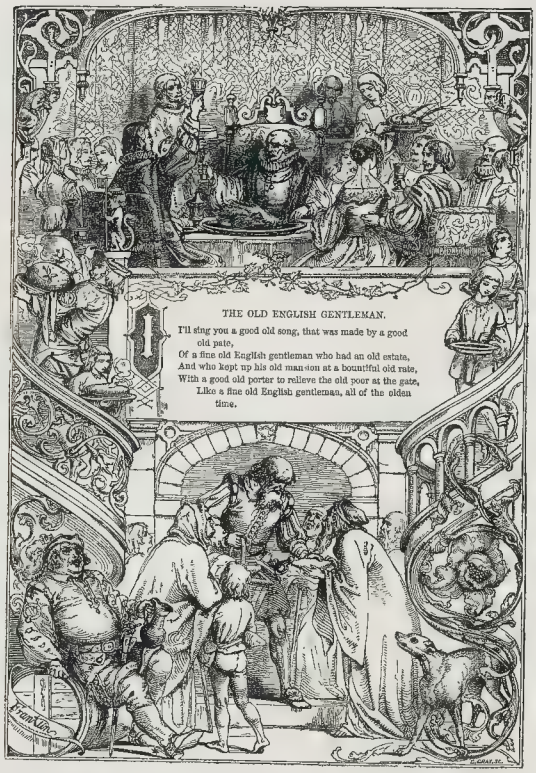
POEMS AND PICTURES. With One Hundred Illustrations on Wood, by English Artists. Burns.

Now that the "Annual" fitful fever has passed away, a far healthier taste in illustration has sprung up from its ashes. Some fifteen years since, the purchasers of costly books as holiday presents, were fascinated with steel plates, for engraving each of which the Artist received, perhaps, one hundred guineas or more. This was vaunted as encouragement of art, &c.; but, the public soon tired of such artistic feats, and the pupilishers, as a consequence, discontinued producing these golden gifts. This is regretted by comparatively few persons; for, whatever may have been the merits of these highly-finished plates, they unquestionably fostered literature of a very puny class; and, in the latter case, the sweeping away of this school of writing is a public benefit. But, what have we in its place? Why, the devotion of some of the highest efforts of English Art to the illustration of some of the finest compositions in our language. The superb volume before us is a noble specimen of this beneficial change. Here have we some of the most spirit-stirring ballads, songs, and poems of our land, (with a few translations,) illustrated by the first artists that our country can produce. Among the authors are Herrick, Dryden, Burns, Wolfe, Collins, Crabbe, Southey, Scott, Coleridge, Wordsworth, Knowles, Praed, Motherwell; besides several living poets of eminence.

The Illustrations are, we think, taken altogether, the finest set of Engravings on Wood yet produced in this country. Among the Artists, we find Cope, Dyce, Cromwick, Horsley, Redgrave, Selous, Pickersgill, Tenniel, Weigall, Topham, Archer, Corbould, Dodgson, Duncan, &c.—names familiar to the public by their exquisite contributions to our metropolitan exhibitions, and to the great Art competitions of the last few years. Amongst the Engravers are Linton, Gray, T. Thompson, T. Armstrong, &c. The subjects are of almost every class—landscape, figure, and sea piece; floral margins; a trellis bordure for each page.

From among so great a number of subjects—each excellent in its way—we might select many for special commendation; for this distinction, however, we have not space in our columns. Besides, all verbal praise must fall short of that immediate appeal to the eye, the picture itself; and, accordingly, we have chosen one of the largest engravings—an illustration of a popular old ballad, designed by Franklin, and engraved



THE OLD ENGLISH GENTLEMAN.
I'll sing you a good old song, that was made by a good old pate,
Of a fine old English gentleman who had an old estate,
And who kept up his old mansion at a bountiful old rate,
With a good old porter to relieve the old poor at the gate,
Like a fine old English gentleman, all of the olden time.

by C. Gray. Among the gems are a few tail-pieces; for example, a Sunset at Sea, drawn by Dodgson, and engraved by Linton, with extreme delicacy; and "Lucy's Flittin'," drawn by Topham—wonderfully characteristic.

Of the cost and difficulty in producing such a volume as the "Poems and Pictures" those unacquainted with Wood Engraving and Printing, technically, can form but an imperfect idea. This has, unquestionably, been a labour of time as well as love. Still, the sterling character of the compositions illustrated, and the high art of the engravings, when fully known, will be appreciated, we trust, to the repayment of the publisher for his unbounded outlay. In conclusion, we should mention that the work is exquisitely printed—a very important item in the success of illustration on wood. The volume is most tastefully bound and gilt; and is, altogether, a first-class work of art, and homage of the pencil to the soul-fraught inspirations of the pen.

NEW WESTMINSTER POLICE COURT AND STATION, VINCENT-SQUARE.

The Police-court and Offices at Queen-square, Westminster, having been found quite inadequate to admit of a proper discharge of the police business in this vastly increasing neighbourhood, greater accommodation has been provided by the erection of new offices in Vincent-square; our Engraving shows the principal elevation. The building to the left is the portion of the premises occupied by the Magistrates and their officers; immediately behind which, the court is situated, easy access being gained to it either from the square or from Rochester-row, in the rear.

The court is a handsome and capacious room, and well arranged for business; it occupies a space of about 30 feet by 24 feet, and 20 feet high; the necessary offices for the clerks and other officers are conveniently arranged, leaving an ample space for the public. In the absence of unnecessary decoration, everything requisite to convenience and stability seems to have been well considered. In addition to the Police-court, these premises now form the central station of the B division of police, providing accommodation for a considerable number of men.

The cells for prisoners are constructed on the most approved principle, combining with security a thorough ventilation and warming. In this respect, a great contrast is exhibited between the provision here made and the miserable accommodation for the unfortunate occupants of the cells attached to the old court.

The works have been executed by Messrs. Bridger and Ashley, of Aldgate; from designs and under the superintendence of Mr. Charles Reeves, surveyor to the Metropolitan Police.

NEW POLICE COURT, VINCENT-SQUARE, WESTMINSTER.

PLATE PRESENTED TO ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S HOSPITAL.

The recent election of His Royal Highness Prince Albert to a Governorship of the Royal Hospital of St. Bartholomew has been commemorated in a truly munificent spirit, by the President and Treasurer of the Hospital presenting to the Foundation some costly silver-gilt Plate, weighing between 300 and 400 ounces.

The Plate consists of three circular shields, or dishes, each nearly 24 inches in diameter; in the centre of which are richly chased subjects, in bold relief, from designs executed by Mr. Thomas Sharp, sculptor.

SILVER-GILT PLATE.—PRINCE ALBERT ELECTED GOVERNOR.

The first group represents His Royal Highness Prince Albert receiving the Deputation from St. Bartholomew's Hospital; the Almoners of which Institution are presenting to the Prince the Staff of Office, and Book of Regulations, on His Royal Highness being elected a Governor, according to ancient custom. The entire group of figures consists of portraits from life; and the dish or salver is the gift of James Bentley, Esq., Treasurer to the Hospital. The inscription on this dish is as follows:—

Presented by James Bentley, Esquire, Treasurer, in Commemoration of his Royal Highness Field Marshal Prince Albert, Consort of her Majesty Queen Victoria, being elected a Governor of the Royal Hospital of St. Bartholomew, A.D. 1845.

SILVER-GILT PLATE.—THE GOOD SAMARITAN.

The two other Dishes correspond in style with the architecture of the Hall. In the centre of one is an elaborate design from the parable of the good Samaritan, exquisitely chased in bas-relief. The other design is taken in part from a cartoon—the subject, the Plague of London, 1665, illustrating the heroic humanity of Sir John Lawrence, the Lord Mayor, General Monk, Dr. Baynton, and others, in the midst of sickness, despair and death.

On the outer compartment of the Dishes are engraved the following inscriptions:—

On the first—

A certain Samaritan, as he journeyed, came where he was: and when he saw him, he had compassion on him.

And went to him, and bound up his wounds, pouring in oil and wine, and set him on his own beast, and brought him to an inn, and took care of him.

And on the morrow when he departed, he took out two pence, and gave them to the host, and said unto him, take care of him: and whatsoever thou spendest more, when I come again, I will repay thee.—Luke x. 33, 34, 35.

And on the second—

SILVER-GILT PLATE.—THE PLAGUE OF LONDON.

It was in the year of our Lord, 1665, that the plague began in our city of London. Vincent.

Comfort us again now after the time that thou hast plagued us.—Psalm xc.

Himself took our infirmities, and bare our sicknesses.—Matthew viii. 17.

On the opposite sides are engraved the Arms of the Hospital and of the Donor, enclosed in an Elizabethan ornamental shield, and underneath the following inscription:

Presented with most affectionate regards, to St. Bartholomew's Hospital, by Matthias Prime Lucas, Esquire, Alderman of the City of London, and President of the Hospital, in the year of our Lord, 1844.

This magnificent Plate has been executed by Messrs. Catchpole and Williams, goldsmiths and jewellers, of 120, Regent-street. It was submitted by Mr. Catchpole, on Friday last, to Prince Albert, at Windsor Castle, when His Royal Highness was pleased to express his admiration of the designs and their perfect execution.

ASTLEY'S THEATRE.

We are enabled to give our readers a representation of the dog Emile, who is now performing at Astley's, in "The Dog of the Pyrenees." If our memory serves us correctly, Emile made his first appearance at M. Franconi's Cirque Olympique, on the Boulvart du Temple, in Paris, in April, 1842, in a drama called "Le Chien des Pyrénées," of which the piece now performing is an adaptation. He is a most sagacious animal —a splendid black Newfoundland dog.

Pieces of this description will not bear any severe analysis, their construction being arranged so as to string together as many of the animal's performances as possible, upon something like a story. "The Dog of the Pyrenees" is, however, one of the best of its class; and looking at the acting of the hero, one cannot help thinking, from his sagacious head, and the natural business-like manner in which he sets about everything, that he is actuated by something more than the results of mere training. In the present scene, one of the characters, a mountaineer of the Pyrenees, is in prison, tied hands and feet to the wall, by cords attached to rings. Emile, who is his companion, is also tied up at some distance. The mountaineer, who is supposed to be his owner, points out a key to the dog, which has been dropped by the gaoler. The dog struggles until he is enabled to slip his head through his collar; and he then undoes the bonds that confine his master, ultimately effecting his deliverance.

His sagacity is constantly shown throughout the piece: indeed, as we have stated, the principal interest is centred in Emile; and his performance is one that we recommend to the notice of our play-going readers. It is the best thing of the kind that has been done since "The Forest of Bondy."

THE DOG "EMILE," AT BATTY'S (ASTLEY'S) AMPHITHEATRE.

GERALD GAGE; OR, THE SECRET.

BY MRS. CROWE,

AUTHOR OF "SUSAN HOPLEY," "MEN AND WOMEN," &c. &c

CHAPTER I.

"RAY, Sir," said a little man, who, with a great-coat buttoned up to his chin, and a red worsted comforter round his throat, was standing in front of the Gloster Coffee House, in Piccadilly, one cold winter's morning,—"are you waiting for the Telegraph?"

"Yes, I am, Sir," answered the person he addressed, who was a handsome, gentlemanly-looking youth, somewhat above twenty, —"I wish with all my soul it would come, for it's devilish cold standing here."

"It 'll be up directly, Sir," said a porter, touching his hat.

"There 's a fire in the office if you like to walk in, Sir," said a clerk, who just then came to the door.

"No, thank ye," answered the impatient traveller; "I want to be off."

"So do I, Sir," said the little man who had first spoken; "but as we can 't get off till the coach comes, we may as well take advantage of the fire."

"I am not cold," answered the young man, walking rapidly backwards and forwards, with his hands in his pockets, and forgetting that he had just asserted that he was cold—"I thought the coach started from here at half-past six?"

"Seven, Sir," said the porter.

"They always tell you half-past six for seven," said the little man.

"I wish they 'd be a little more punctual," exclaimed the other.

"There 's seven striking now, and here 's the coach coming up," said the porter; and at the same moment, the well-appointed vehicle turned out of St. James's-street, and dashed up to the Inn door: the ostler placed himself at the horses' heads, the coachman flung down his ribbons, and rolling off the box, turned into the office, whilst the porters began to throw up the boxes and portmanteaus that were accumulated on the pavement. Several other passengers, also, who had been lounging in the street, or warming themselves at the fire, now drew near, and began to take their seats.

"Inside or out, Sir?" said the coachman, issuing from the office, with the weigh-bill in his hand.

"Inside," answered the impatient traveller.

"Then we shall have the pleasure of travelling together," observed the little man who had first spoken.

GERALD GAGE AND EMILY.

The gentleman he addressed did not look as if he foresaw much pleasure in the companionship. However, they both stept in; and, all other preliminaries being arranged, the coachman mounted his box, and away.

"Stop! stop!" screamed a female voice—"Hough! hoigh!" cried the men at the Inn door.

"Is that the Bath Coach?" asked the belated passenger.

"No room outside," cried the coachman.

"No room!" exclaimed the indignant girl—"Why, our John took my place a week ago, and saw it booked himself!"

"Did he, my dear?" said the coachman; "why then I s 'pose we must give you an inside. Put her inside, Bill, till we drop somebody upon the road, and put that 'ere bandbox into the boot."

These orders were quickly obeyed, and, once more, the coach started on its way, with its three insides and its full complement out.

After the first glance at each other, the former, till they had got off the stones and proceeded some distance beyond Hyde-park Gates, seemed sufficiently occupied with peering through the dim glass at the houses that lined the road they were flying through. Probably, however, in reality, not one of the party was thinking any thing about the material objects to which their eyes were directed. Their thoughts were with what they had left, or what they were going to. Jenny Spike, for example, was thinking of John, the footman at the place she was just leaving, wondering much that he had not made her the proposals of marriage which she had been daily expecting for the last six months; but concluding that, as he had not taken the trouble to leave his bed on that morning early enough to conduct her to the coach, he had no design of carrying his attentions any further, she determined to banish him from her heart for ever. Following up this resolution by fixing her mind, with uncommon fortitude, on the visionary image of the footman yet unseen, with whom she was next to be domesticated, she considered it highly probable that he would be tall and thin, and interesting and amiable, because she had observed those to be the attributes of footmen in general; and that he would be struck with her she could not doubt, for that had been another peculiarity attending all the footmen she had yet lived with, a circumstance which caused her to look upon it as something rather inexplicable that she should still be call l Miss Spike. The thoughts of the little man, who was a lawyer, and whose name was Mr. James Pilrig, were intent upon the conditions of a purchase that he was travelling into the country to effect for a client of his; starting from which point, they took a rapid survey of the many and complicated affairs of that gentleman, concluding with congratulating himself on having so desirable a client; whilst his mind, for a single moment, dwelt on the possibility that, if he transacted the old man's business very much to his satisfaction, a codicil, in which his own name should appear, might be added to the testamentary document he had lately been engaged in drawing up. This was uncertain; but, in the meantime, the being employed at all by so wealthy an individual, was extremely gratifying, and would, infallibly, be the means of introducing him to more business, not to mention the substantial bills of costs in all their lovely longitude, and leaves "thick as the leaves of Valombrosa" that presented themselves to his delighted fancy. The truth was, that Mr. James Pilrig's success in business had not hitherto been great; he had had no opportunity of getting into a profitable line, and he looked upon his employment by this gentleman as his first step towards fortune. "Let the world but know that I am the confidential agent of Obiah Livingstone, Esquire, and my name is up," was the agreeable conviction with which he closed his cogitations on the subject.

With respect to the impatient traveller, he had his thoughts too, not less engrossing than those of his companions, but the subject of them we shall leave time and the course of this history to disclose.

In the meanwhile, Mr. James Pilrig, having wound up his reflections in the satisfactory manner we have indicated, began to feel a disposition to loose his tongue and unlock the casket of his thoughts; so, rousing himself in his air of pre-occupation, he rubbed his hands briskly, turned briskly to his fellow-traveller, remarked that he supposed the coach would stop to breakfast about nine o'clock—a proposition which the gentleman addressed did not seem to feel himself called upon either to affirm or deny, and to which, therefore, he said nothing; but Mr. Pilrig, who, for the reasons above mentioned, was feeling extremely comfortable, was not to be depressed by one failure; so, turning his attentions to Jenny Spike, he asked her if she was going all the way to Bath—a question which that young lady unreservedly answered in the affirmative, following up the conversation by an inquiry as to what hour the coach was likely to arrive there. Neither did it require much encouragement to make her further communicative; and before they reached their breakfast station, with the exception of the loves of the footmen, Mr. Pilrig was in possession of the leading events of Miss Spike's history, which, however, were not sufficiently remarkable to be set down here. The conclusion was that she had left her last place, where she was housemaid, because, after being always accustomed to wait on her mistress, that lady had thought proper to engage a regular lady's-maid, "and she wasn't going for to be under her, in course—; proud, conceited minx!" and, indeed, she confessed that not only this lady's-maid in particular, but all lady's-maids without exception, were the objects of her especial aversion; and she did not scruple to confide to Mr. Pilrig her firm determination never to live in the house where "one of that sort was. The airs they give themselves," she asserted him, "wasn't to be told; and, for her part, she never could abide 'em!" This conversation lasted Mr. Pilrig till the coach stopped for breakfast; and, when they started again, they found the fourth seat occupied by another passenger, and one who, to the chatty little lawyer's satisfaction, appeared perfectly well disposed for conversation. He was a man apparently about five-and-thirty years of age, well dressed, neat, and not ill-looking; his manners were confident, and his mode of speaking plausible. Benevolence seemed to be his favourite virtue; and he had delivered himself of several very amiable sentiments before he had been in the coach half an hour. So was his conversation with Mr. Pilrig, and to his own affairs, informing the company that he had been to Maidenhead, to look at an estate that was to be sold in that neighbourhood, but he had found it so inferior to the auctioneer's description of it that he was quite disgusted. In short, he said, the extravagant romancings with which those gentlemen always set forth the merits of their unsold and perplexed their customers were quite vexatious. They kept him running from one end of the island to the other, looking for what he never found; the hanging woods, and velvet lawns, and silver streams, appeared no where but in their advertisements. He then proceeded to draw a splendid picture of a seat that he wanted to purchase, altogether talked in a manner that could not fail to inspire his hearers with a magnificent idea of his fortune and a profound veneration for his person. At least, if they were not so impressed, the fault must have been theirs, not his; and, accordingly, Mr. Pilrig, for one, yielded without a struggle to the fascination. Miss Spike would, no doubt, have been equally enchanted, had she been able to discover any possible connection between the wealth of her fellow-traveller and the advancement of her own fortune, but she did not; and as for the impatient gentleman by her side, he appeared too much wrapt in his own reflections to be conscious of anything that was going on. But the lawyer was subdued; a man, evidently of immense fortune and high connections, running about the world to look for an estate, and not able to find one magnificent enough for his purpose—the idea was sublime! And, then, there was so much urbanity, so much frankness, not the slightest reserve about his affairs, he wondered who was his agent! How desirable it was that he should have somebody who could relieve him from part of the trouble of purchasing these unattainable beauties, or, at least, prevent his being deluded by the excessive fancies of the auctioneers! In short, Mr. Pilrig perceived at once that which Miss Spike had failed to discern in her own case; he saw that a very agreeable connection might be established between the stranger's purse and his own pocket. He therefore felt he was only doing justice to himself, when he seized the opportunity of a pause in the monologue—for such it had hitherto nearly been—to hint that he was himself a professional man, and to express delicately that no one understood his business better; taking occasion to cite several instances in which, through his acuteness and penetration, enormous sums had been saved to his clients. He observed that gentlemen about to purchase estates were in many situations in which it was their business to examine the title-deeds—some one who thoroughly understood the thing; he himself had had considerable experience in that line, and he flattered himself had been the means of preventing a great deal of mischief. These words appeared by no means to fall upon an inattentive ear; the stranger seemed struck with Mr. Pilrig's acquaintance with that subject; he asked his opinion on several knotty points, and gently insinuated that whenever he met with anything to suit him, he should like very much to have the affair looked into by a gentleman who seemed so thoroughly conversant with the subject. Mr. Pilrig felt flattered, and looked grave and voluble; he had evidently hooked his fish, and he resolved to clench it; so, with a significant nod, he avowed that he was then on his way to Somersetshire for the purpose of transacting a little private business for a client of his, one of the richest men in the country—no less a person than the great Obiah Livingstone. He placed his hand beside his mouth, and stooped forward to meet the stranger's ear when he pronounced the awful name; but the whisper was so loud, that if there had been twenty people in the coach, they might have heard it, and he would, probably, have been sorry if they had not. The impression made on the present company, however, except the stranger, seemed very slight. Jenny Spike had never heard of Mr. Livingstone in her life, and appeared totally unmoved; the impatient traveller slightly turned his head as the name reached his ears, as if he, like the rest of the world, had heard of the enormous wealth imputed to the owner, but he immediately resumed his former position, and seemed to take no further interest in the conversation. But he, for whom the hit was intended, was evidently struck:—"Indeed!" cried he, with evident astonishment; "you surprise me. I have no acquaintance with Mr. Livingstone whatever; but I had always understood that Wright and Miller were his solicitors"—and Mr. Pilrig felt that he looked a little incredulous.

"Yes," said he, "for general business—general business, he does employ Wright and Miller; but for anything of a particular nature—you understand me—confidential"—and Mr. Pilrig nodded, as much as to say, "I am the man."

GRAND BAL COSTUME, AT SOUTHAMPTON.

This truly magnificent fête, so long and anxiously looked for by the fashionables of the town and neighbourhood of Southampton, took place on New Year's Eve, at the Royal Victoria Assembly Rooms. The Lady Patronesses were—Lady Charles Wellesley, Lady Mary Long, Lady Catherine Fleming, Lady Henry Paulet, Hon Lady Butler, Mrs. Combe Compton, Mrs. Chamberlayne, Mrs. Capt. Coit, Mrs. Holloway, and Mrs. Deane Shute. The following noblemen and gentlemen performed the duties of Stewards:—Viscount Palmerston, Lord Charles Wellesley, Hon. Sir E. Butler, Sir J. Barker Mill, Bart., H. C. Compton, Esq. M.P., A. R. Drummond, Esq., J. W. Fleming, Esq., Col. Robbins, T. Chamberlayne, Esq., H. Bonham, Esq., and Captain Coit. The number of tickets was limited to 360, but applications continued to pour in up till the latest moment prior to the ball

The band of Mr. Laurie (director of the orchestra at the Court of St. James's, Almack's, &c.) was specially engaged for the occasion.

The company commenced to arrive shortly before ten o'clock, from which time they poured in rapidly, and by most elegant vehicles. The passenger portion of the company had arrived The Ball was opened by the quadrille previously bespoken by Mrs. Captain Coit.

Mrs. Coit having entered the room, accompanied by the ladies and gentlemen of her train, the quadrille "La Villa Reale," of Bosisio, was danced, the effort of which was extremely interesting. The ladies of the party, all richly habited as dowagers, comprised Mrs. Coit, Miss Charlotte Bouverie, Miss Harriett Bouverie, Miss Gertrude Eyre, Miss Caroline Duke, Miss Mary Duke, Miss Dolton, and Miss Wallop. The gentlemen, who assumed the character of Mamelukes, were—Capt. Coit, Mr. Barton Wallop, Mr. Newton Wallop, Mr. Ellsworgh Woodcock W. G. Townshend, Mr. Forrest, Mr. Hubbock, and Mr. Mayo Lukin. The costumes were very sumptuous: in the head-dresses of the ladies, the Bird of Paradise had a most brilliant effect.

About midnight, Lady Catherine Fleming's party entered the room; and the Poudre quadrille, previously bespoken by her Ladyship, was immediately performed, the music from Balfe's opera of "The Enchantress." The ladies were—Lady Catherine Fleming, Lady Campbell, Miss Prettyman, Miss E. Prettyman, Miss Barnes, Miss Mary Powell, Miss Legge, and Miss — Legge; the gentlemen were the Hon. Mordaunt Fitzgerald (Grenadier Guards), Mr. J. W. Fleming, Capt. Fabian (Grenadier Guards), Mr. W. O. Hambrough, Mr. Edward Allen, Capt. Weir, Capt. Powell (Grenadier Guards), and Mr. T. Hartop. The costumes were very superb; the whole party wearing the full court dress of the reign of George the Second. The three gentlemen of the Grenadier Guards wore the same dresses in which they appeared at the Queen's Ball—the uniform of the Guards a century ago.

The ball-room now presented a most brilliant and stirring spectacle: the richness and variety of the costumes, English and foreign, and the profuse display of jewellery, set off by an intense flood of light, formed a coup d'œil of indescribable splendour.

Supper was served in the large room under the ball-room: the carte was very recherché, and reflected infinite credit on Mr. Whitehead, to whom the preparation of the banquet had been confided.

It was announced at midnight; and it remained on the table during the whole of the night, with an unbroken supply of wines, tea, and coffee.

The dance was kept up with the greatest spirit throughout the night, and as the band played the National Anthem, the clock indicated that six hours of the new year had flown.

The whole of the arrangements, which were under the superintendence of Peter Dickson, Esq., master of the ceremonies, gave unqualified satisfaction; and the ball has passed off with high credit to all parties concerned.

We have not room for an entire list of the fashionables present; but must find space for the following, from the rôle of costumes:

ARRIVAL OF THE LONDON CORPORATION PROCESSION IN THE GREAT QUADRANGLE, WINDSOR CASTLE.—(SEE PAGE 18.)

THE "LADY FEVERSHAM."

An unsuccessful attempt was made last week to raise the Lady Feversham, which lies sunk in the river Tyne, at Shields, by the crew of the steam-vessel belonging to the Universal Salvage Company. The mode of operation is curious. In the first place, two of the crew descended into the water for the purpose of examining the sunken vessel. Upon the head of each diver is placed a metal helmet, having in front three windows of plate glass, through which, if the water is not muddy, he is enabled to see. Attached to this helmet is a pipe, which is supplied with air from a pump fixed in a boat. A life-line is held by the diver, which he pulls when he requires more air, and which signal is understood by those above. The air thus conveyed to the helmet escapes underneath, and prevents the water from coming in. The body and legs of the diver are protected from the water by an Indian-rubber dress; and he has lead fastened to his shoes, and sheet-lead to his breast and back, weighing altogether about a hundred weight, in order to enable him to resist the buoyancy of the water.

The diver descends by a rope-ladder fixed to a steam-boat, and after examining the vessel, returns to report the result of his observations. This enables the officers to fix their chains in the proper position. It is usual to have eight chains, two forward, three midships, two aft, and one from stem to stern, and to these purchase-chains are attached, with a series of empty flexible cases, which are air-tight. As soon as everything is properly fixed, air is forced into the cases by pumps in the boats. Each of these cases, it is stated, when inflated by air, can raise five tons weight. The operations commenced about eleven o'clock in the forenoon, and continued for two hours, when it was discovered that one of the chains had slipped, which lessened the amount of buoyancy so much as to render the work useless.

PERSONS LIABLE TO BE DRAWN FOR THE MILITIA.—As it is now certain that a ballot, after the usual manner, will ere long be taken for persons to serve in the militia, we will briefly state the leading circumstances which render persons liable and non-liable to be drawn: 1. No person under the age of eighteen, or over the age of forty-five, is liable, whether he has property or not. 2. Any party who has once been drawn, cannot be drawn a second time. 3. Any person having two children is exempt, provided he is not worth £100. 4. Any individual having £100, however large his family may be, is liable to be drawn. If disqualified by lameness, or otherwise, he must find a substitute. 5. Personal disqualifications on the part of the individuals not worth £100, will render them non-liable, if certified to by the surgeon.

THE BRITISH NAVY.—The navy on the 1st instant consisted of the following ships in commission, of all classes, viz.:—Sea-going line of battle ships, 11; frigates, 49; steam-frigates, 9; steam-sloops and small craft, 70, of which 33 are home packets and 3 steam-tugs; sloops, 59; small vessels, 27; stationary, 14; total, 240, of which number 28 are employed on surveying service, 2 on a voyage of discovery to the Arctic regions, 4 troop-ships, 3 steamers on the lakes of Canada, and 5 yachts. The sailing vessels mount 3219 guns, being an increase of 7 ships and 155 guns upon the number in the service on the 1st of January, 1845. The following is the number of officers on the list:—Flag, 134; captains and retired captains, 769; commanders and retired commanders, 1137; lieutenants, 2028; marine officers, 741; masters, 432; medical officers, 970; pursers, 485; naval instructors, 46; chaplains, 97; mates, 172; second masters, 199; acting assistant surgeons, 59; qualified clerks, 216; total, 7985, being an increase of 132 over last year's force. Times.

THE "LADY FEVERSHAM," TYNEMOUTH HARBOUR.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

HALF-TIMBERED HOUSE, CHESTER.

Three centuries ago, the chief materials of the English house were wood and plaster; whence the edifices of this kind are technically termed "half-timbered.' A common but peculiar feature, too, was the projecting upper floors; besides ornamented gables, &c.; all which contributed much to picturesqueness.

The ancient house in the Engraving—the Falcon Inn, at Bridge-street, Chester, one of the oldest in the city, as the Gothic arches in the basement and over the steps testify—is a specimen of the architectural character above named. The basement is tenanted by a butcher; and to reach his cellar-like shop, the descent of a few steps is necessary. The inn portion of the building is attained by ascending the flight of steps to the left.

HALF-TIMBERED HOUSE, CHESTER.

Chester is one of the very few places in England which has maintained in a tolerable state of completeness the walls which were built for their defence in remote ages; in no place are they so entire as at Chester. But now, instead of contributing to the defence of the inhabitants, they afford only an agreeable promenade, with pleasant views, at various points, of the surrounding country

THE NEW POSTMASTER-GENERAL.—The Earl of St. Germans commenced his duties as Postmaster-General on Saturday last, by a minute inspection of the various departments of the Post-Office. The Noble Earl was attended in his progress through the establishment by Col. Maberly, the secretary. His Lordship appeared to pay great attention to the various stages through which letters pass from the time of their posting to that of despatch, discussing freely with the executive officers on the nature of the duty in their charge. In the newspaper office the magnitude of the business appeared to surprise the Noble Lord, who entered that part of the building a short time before the great rush of newspapers were posted. Upwards of 30,000 newspapers were posted at this window on Saturday in less than a quarter of an hour, 5 ruling a pile several feet square, and some yards high. His Lordship took his departure shortly after the mails were dispatched to their several destinations.

COMMERCE OF BELGIUM.—The foreign commerce of Belgium, during the year of 1844, has been more considerable than that in 1843, which was the most prosperous previously known. The imports and exports united amount to 591 millions of francs, exceeding the movement of 1843 by 74½ millions, or 14 per cent., and by 197½ millions, or 28 per cent., the quinquennial average of the period from 1839 to 1843. In the above total the exports of Belgium to France are down for 77 millions, and of France to Belgium for 44 millions

THE OPENING SESSION.

The period of speculation and uncertainty is almost at an end; on Thursday next her Majesty will open Parliament, and then must follow a series of explanations of all the mysteries that have so perplexed politicians, not with the "fear of change," but its actual occurrence. The Premier will have to explain why, with a majority stronger in numbers than any Minister for the last twenty years, he suddenly broke up a Government that enjoyed respect abroad, support at home, peace, and a surplus revenue: with all this, the Ministry foundered all at once, like

> Ships that have gone down at sea,
> When Heaven was all tranquillity.

The pilot, who yielded in the calm, but who may even yet "weather the storm," will be obliged to render some account of the occurrence. His rival, who was called at so short a notice to the temporarily abandoned helm, must also explain why he could not manage the vessel—why he failed even to enlist a crew; whether it was squabbles among the officers, or differences about the "provision" department—all must come out. The oracles must find a tongue, and with words of authority quiet and set at rest those ambiguas voces, which have too long occupied the public ear with so many rumours, and most of them false ones. Intense will be the expectation when the Premier rises with his narrative of the past; often have we admired his unrivalled ability of statement, telling no more than he wishes to reveal, and yet wearing throughout such an air of candour and openness, as if, being among friends, he need use no reserve. Often, and in great difficulties, has he silenced discontent among his friends, and disarmed or mollified the rancour of opposition. The Income Tax, the Tariff, the Irish Colleges, the rescinding of the vote on the Factory Question—what prudence and dexterity were required to carry through all these measures! But not in any crisis of his past career was he called on to make a larger demand on all his powers than in that which awaits him in the opening session. Look at the proceedings of the great number of meetings of the agricultural interest which have lately been held; with few exceptions, harsh, indeed, has been the language used with respect to him; only one topic has called forth stronger invective, and that is the League. His resignation of office has awakened suspicion among the bulk of the counties, and the fears of the constituencies will compel the representatives to stand aloof, to be chary of proffers of support, to turn the smiles with which they have been wont to regard the Treasury Bench into

> A brow
> Sullen as that of Saturn, when he sits
> Apart and frowning on the births of men.

The cheers will be less loud and less frequent, and there will be all the signs painfully visible of the constraint inevitable among a body estranged from its chief. By what eloquence can all this suspicion be changed to cordiality, this discontent into confidence? The words of Mercury and the songs of Apollo might almost fail in accomplishing the task; and yet, judging from past achievements, we have a strong belief that Peel will effect the little less than miracle. The landed interest will be compelled to see and to acknowledge that their best hopes must still repose in him, and hereafter it is not unlikely that something like regret will be felt, perhaps even expressed, at the hasty invective that has been poured out against him for intentions which it is not known that he entertains, and a policy which, as it has not yet been declared, none are able to explain, or with justice to condemn.

And the declaration of that policy! Hard as it may be to explain the past, so as to remove misgivings, far more difficult will it be to lay down the course of the future, so as to afford satisfaction. How reconcile to any alterations those who have protested against all—even the slightest! Here is the pinch of the question; but, if it is seen to be impossible to overcome the difficulty, we have no doubt it will be evaded. The men of the most extreme opinions on any question are generally a minority: these it will be impossible to persuade; and, in all probability, their opposition will be disregarded, and the necessary support will be furnished from the moderate Conservatives, and that portion of the Whig landed interest who advocate protection.

But even among this consenting section of friends what perplexities will not arise! They will say like Othello in his hours of doubt and suspicion—"I think thou'rt honest, and I think thou art not." Their minds will be in a constant change from fear to hope, and back again. They look on the past through a long series of years, and during the whole period, who could be a better champion of their cause; and they ask themselves—is it possible that all these declarations and exertions are now to go for nothing? And then will come over them a most painful sense of their helplessness; the man whom they at once trust and fear, has made himself the only possible leader; his own abilities have placed him beyond rivalry, their confidence has given him that position so long that no one has arisen able to take it. The great tree has overshadowed and prevented the growth of all the shrubs in its vicinity. They have no "other of his fathom;" they are, like lesser spirits, compelled to obey the great magician. "Ariel and all his quality" were tasked to the "strong bidding" of Prospero; but it was not without occasional murmurings, and, at such times, the holder of the staff of power reminds his servitor of past obligations, of the "torments that he did free him from," not omitting, also, threats of returning him to that former state, with addition of suffering. The Premier released his party from the "torments" of Opposition, in which they had remained, like Ariel in the cloven pine: can they do less, asks the Conservative Prospero, than perform my will? And then come indistinct threats of exile from the sunny side of the official world—a return to former punishment; and not only threats, but an actual step made towards fulfilling it. What remains for those so completely in the power of the commanding mind, but, like the repentant spirit of the drama, to promise all obedience, and to do all required,

> To answer thy best pleasure—be't to fly,
> To dive, to ride upon the curled clouds,
> To do thee business i' the veins of the earth
> When it is bak'd with frost!

They are under an overwhelming necessity. It is useless now to repent—if reflection takes that turn—that they should have so

UNIFORM OF THE BRITISH MILITIA.—(SEE NEXT PAGE.)

zealously and undoubtingly built up the greatness they must serve. Parties can as little read the future as individuals; or many an error, seen too late, would be avoided. Had the present state of things been anticipated, the Conservatives would never have left themselves with no resource—no second Leader to fall back upon. The great wealth and vast influence of the Landed Interest must have enabled it to command the services of political talent, had it sought and fostered it. But the place was filled by one believed fitting in every respect to hold it, and the precaution was not taken. A change has come over that Leader; there is doubt and dismay among his followers; but to whom can they apply? Some political cabbitries could be superseded—for they are party men, and little else. Peel cannot, for he has great influence over all parties in the House, and almost with all classes out of it. To the fiery Stanley, for instance, they could say—

> If I quench thee, thou flaming Minister,
> I can at will thy former light restore
> If it repent me.

The prudent, cautious, clear-headed Peel cannot be so set aside, or his place so filled up, for

> Once put out thine,
> Thou cunning'st pattern of excelling nature,
> I know not where is the Promethean heat
> That can thy light relume.

All these jealousies and fears will soon be seen in active operation. They will be a formidable array for the Premier to meet, yet met they must be. On all sides there are difficulties; the "situation" is complicated beyond all precedent; and though every opening session is anticipated with anxiety as to the measures it is to bring forth, never, we believe, was that anxiety wrought to so high a pitch as previous to the session of 1846.

THE MILITIA.

The probable embodiment of the Militia having ex..ted very considerable interest, our readers may be gratified with a few historical particulars of this force.

The term Militia may be used to denote a body of soldiers raised for the defence of a nation; but, in Great Britain and Ireland, the term is applied particularly to those men who are chosen by ballot to serve for a certain number of years within the limits of these realms: that is, the Militia is enrolled only for home service, and may be said to constitute a domestic guard.

In the time of the Saxons, the military force of this country was formed by a species of Militia; and every five hydes of land were charged with the equipment of a man for the service.

After the Norman Conquest of the country, the proprietors of the land were compelled, by providing men and arms, in proportion to their estates, to contribute to the defence of the realm, in the event of a threatened invasion. This Militia seems, at first, to be liable to be marched to any part of the Kingdom at pleasure; but, in the reign of Edward III., it was decreed, by a statute, that no man thus raised, should be sent out of his county, except in times of public danger. From the reign of Philip and Mary, the lords-lieutenants have had the charge, under the Sovereign, of raising the Militia in their respective counties.

In 1641, the Parliament having got into their hands all the military force of the nation; and, in the following year, the two houses passed a bill, in which it was decreed that the power over the Militia, and also the command of all forts, castles, and garrisons, should be vested in commissioners. The King, (Charles I.) having refused his assent to the bill, the Parliament made a declaration that was necessary to put the nation in a posture of defence, and immediately issued orders to muster the Militia: on the other hand, the King issued commissions of array for a like purpose to some of the nobility; and thus commenced that war which desolated the country for several years.

Charles II. re-established the ancient Militia on the former footing, and vested in himself the chief command; the lords-lieutenants of the counties being subordinate to the Sovereign. The property liability was then changed: no one who had less than £300 yearly income, or less than £4,000 in goods (or vice versâ), could be compelled to furnish a foot soldier; nor could one who did not possess £600 per annum, or an estate worth £6000, be made to provide a man for the cavalry. Persons having less property were required, according to their means, to contribute towards finding a foot or a horse soldier. The Militia was then mustered and trained, by regiments, once a year and during four days: there were other musterings and trainings, and the men were obliged to provide and clothe himself with his own ammunition. These regulations, from their great cost, at length, ceased to be observed; and the trainings were discontinued in every part of the realm except the City of London.

In 1756, under the apprehension of an invasion by a French army, a national Militia was again raised and organised under the sanction of an Act of Parliament, 29 Geo II.

The Militia laws were repealed in the second year of George III., when a new Act regulating the service of the force was passed; and in the 26th Geo. III., all the previous existing statutes relating to the Militia were repealed, and several new regulations, however, were made by Acts passed in the 42nd, 51st, and 52nd years of the same reign.

Many of our readers are, we believe, aware of the fact of an official circular having been recently issued from the Horse Guards respecting the probable embodiment of the Militia; and, on such account, many vague rumours have found free circulation upon the subject. Now, respecting the calling out, it should be recollected that the Act of Parliament authorising the ballot for the Militia has been suspended many years. The result of this is, that the alterations in the amount of the population of the counties rendering it very hard for any equal distribution of the quota to be furnished by each county. It is likely that immediately on the meeting of Parliament a bill will be brought in to authorise this measure, and the first step then will be to ascertain the number of men requisite to as a part of the necessary measures for carrying out the intention of Parliament. Upon this being done, the ballot for each county follows, and then the orders of Government as to the duty to be performed.

We have received an immense number of questions on the calling out of the Militia, relating to pay, exemptions, &c. Answers on these points are of very doubtful utility, inasmuch as the old Militia Act is suspended, and in renewing it, the Government may introduce great changes in the details of the service. There must be a bill to authorise the ballot, and an estimate must be passed by the House of Commons for the pay of the men and officers.

"A Subscriber."—It is the general belief that the Militia will be called out for twenty-eight days only, and for that reason we contend that it is impossible to make it an efficient force for any military purpose whatever. That the same men disciplined as permanent regiments, and then embodied in the Line, make excellent soldiers, no one can dispute. Our Correspondent looks at what it is, when new raw recruits form the force; we spoke of the inutility of placing confidence in the training of a few days.

"A Prussian."—The Landwehr of Prussia is more like a regular army than what we understand in England by a Militia, since every Prussian must serve for three years, then for a fortnight in each year till twelve years have elapsed; and, in case of war, is forced at once into the standing army, there being exemptions nor substitutes allowed. The defence of the body first raised by plan only consists of the—5th, 6th, 7th, and eighth corps. In the campaign of 1806, the Prussian Army was better trained than the one beaten at Jena; and, even then, it was as much the political enthusiasm of the people, awakened by the promise of freedom and a Constitution, that saved the honour of the flag, as the superiority of military organisation. But this forced military service is wholly repugnant to the spirit of our Constitution, and no greater calamity could befal England than any approach to it

The last Census will be made the basis of the levy, and this alone will make a great saturation in the number of men to be furnished from each county. It is believed at the Government Office that what is termed the reserve force of the country in case of emergency, and for this purpose a short service will be sufficient; but, once embodied, every means will be used to induce the men to enter the Line; it is, in fact, an indirect way of increasing the regular army. Suppose the old regulations to be renewed, we may answer a few of the questions with—which we have been overwhelmed:

"E.D."—Residence in the City of London may exempt from the Middlesex Militia; but the City will raise a corps of its own, and in this all residents will be liable to serve

"A Constant Subscriber"—Being the son of an old soldier gives no exemption.

"Enquirer." It will depend on the provisions of the renewal act.

"Dubitus."—A capper and dentist, if drawn, must serve or find a substitute.

"Civis."—A Militia-man will at any time be received as a volunteer into the Line. The force is not sent out of the kingdom.

The Illustration upon the preceding page shows the uniform worn by the Militia, at the date of their last embodiment; with the exception of the cap, which is the new one lately introduced in our foot regiments; and which, it is stated, will in future form part of the Militia costume.

FRIGHTFUL ACCIDENT ON THE CARLSRUHE AND MANHEIM RAILWAY.—On the 2nd instant, at six o'clock in the evening, near the St. Ilgen station, two passenger trains on the above line, one proceeding to Carlsruhe and the other to Manheim, met with a fearful collision, the result of which will be the sacrifice of more than twenty lives. It appears that, owing to the mismanagement of the signals, the two trains running in opposite directions met on the same line. The drivers observed this when, unfortunately, it was too late, and did all in their power to stop the trains. They succeeded in reducing the speed, but the trains, nevertheless, came in contact with such fearful violence, that one of the engines was smashed to pieces, rendered utterly useless, and several of the carriages dashed to atoms. The number of persons injured by this calamity was forty-two of whom had their legs cut off, as though they had been amputated by a surgical operation, and twenty-three mortally wounded. This accident has caused the greater excitement, as it is the first which has occurred in the Grand Duchy of Baden.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE

The Paris papers, this week, seem more occupied with an accident which took place last Saturday, to the viaduct of Barentin, on the Rouen and Havre Railroad, than with the political discussions in the Chamber. Of this accident the Constitutionnel gives the following account:

"About six o'clock on Saturday morning a fearful noise, which was heard as far as Pavilly, aroused the inhabitants of Barentin. The twenty-eight pillars which supported the arches of the viaduct fell one after another, and almost instantaneously. The inhabitants of Barentin instantly hastened to the scene of ruin, supposing that such an awful disaster must have caused the death of some of the inhabitants; but, fortunately, such was found not to have been the case. If those enormous pillars had not providentially fallen as they did (in a straight line)—had they fallen but a few yards to either side, a great number of persons must have been entombed, whilst in their sleep. One detached building only was destroyed by the falling mass; it was a corn-mill, situated upon the river St Austrebertha. The man who was attending it escaped unhurt. The river St. Austrebertha, which runs beneath the viaduct, turned from its course by the fallen materials, flooded the country at either side, and the manufactories situated upon its banks, below the viaduct, and which are worked by that stream, were suddenly brought to a stand-still.

"The viaduct was commenced in the spring of 1844, since which time between two hundred and three hundred workmen have been daily employed upon it. It was not quite completed at the time of its destruction. It was composed of twenty-seven brick arches, each resembling a span of fifteen metres, and supported by twenty-eight pillars, likewise of brick, each of which was four metres thick. The greatest elevation was thirty-two metres. The entire length of the work was five hundred metres. All that now remains of this gigantic construction are the bases of the pillars, and even these are much shaken. The loss is estimated at 1,300,000f.

"The Rouen journals attribute the disaster to the following causes:—The bases of the columns were too small and feeble in comparison to the diameter of the arches; the bricks of which they were formed were of a very inferior quality nearly resembling those denominated rouge bricks, which are liable to split in every weather, and also by the effect of pressure, and crumble away like dust.

"The mortar was made in the most economical manner possible, not having been sufficiently handworked: the ingredients were not blended, which is apparent from the large lumps of unslaked lime which may be seen close to each other. The contractors of the work will lose 600,000f. by the disaster; it will, likewise, retard the opening of the railroad some months longer."

The Commerce states, that an opinion was made through the ruins of the viaduct of Barentin, and the river was allowed to resume its natural course, the water was so impregnated with lime, that it poisoned all the fish in the river, for a considerable distance below the village of Barentin.

The Directors of the Rouen and Havre Railway have written a letter, in which they state that they have had a meeting with their engineer in chief, the result of which is, that the excess of reconstruction of the fourteen viaduct will fall on the contractors, and that the opening of the line will not be delayed more than two months. It is said that just at the moment before the fall of the viaduct of Barentin, M Lengery, Engineer in Chief, who had to overlook the works of the arches in his cabriolet, when the horse stopped short and refused to pass. M Lengery struck him with his whip, but all in vain he refused to stir. At the same moment the fall took place. The water of the river was poisoned with the quantity of lime that fell in, and a great number of fish came to the surface dead.

The Commerce states that the thermometer at Lyons marked 9 deg. centigrade (17 of Fahrenheit), below the freezing point on the 7th inst

We regret to learn by the Gazette des Mids that a decided case of plague has been discovered in the lazaretto of Marseilles.

The Chamber of Peers has proceeded with the discussion on the paragraphs of the Address. On the paragraph being read which was connected with the foreign policy of the Government, M. Guizot ascended the tribune, and, in a long and luminous speech, defended the line of policy pursued by the Government, which, he maintained, was the one best suited to support the dignity, as well as the prosperity, of the country. The most interesting part of M. Guizot's speech to English readers was that which related to Texas, and the independence of Mexico, and the Message of President Polk. "In regard to Texas and Mexico," he said "the independence of that country was admitted by the United States in 1837, by France in 1838, and by England in 1840, and concluded a treaty of commerce with Texas; we had interests intermingled with hers, and we had a right to advise her to pause what appeared to us to be, for her and for us, the best condition of independence. We, therefore, recommended her to remain independent. Not only were we consistent with our policy, but we consulted therein the interests of France, particularly in her commercial relations, as hereafter, Texas might offer us great advantages in the way of trade for our goods. France had, besides, important political interests in the independence of Texas. It is the interposition of an independent State in the midst of the United States. There are in America two races—the Spanish and the Anglo-American. It is our interest that the former should not be oppressed by the latter, and the independence of Texas would have the effect of lessening the chances of a conflict between the two. It is, in fact, advisable to multiply in America, the States which independent, for it is the most favourable condition for liberty and for the development of prosperity and peace. The division of Europe into a number of independent States has largely contributed to the development of European prosperity. All intelligent minds have invariably protested against the establishment of a universal monarchy in Europe, and a universal republic would not be better for it. This is one of the ideas which has influenced our policy towards Texas, and this policy we shall rely on it will prevail. Our commercial and political interests would suffer materially by the foundation of a governmental unity in America."

The Chamber of Deputies met on Monday to hear read the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. The passages in which allusion is made to the good understanding between France and England cannot fail to give satisfaction to the intelligent and patriotic portion of the community in both countries. They are as follow

"We are happy to learn that you continue to receive from all foreign powers pacific and amicable assurances. Peace is the first want of nations. It belongs to those whose strength is equal to their courage to preserve it by advantageous ages. The policy which has maintained the general peace amidst so many storms, with the support of the state, excites the gratitude of the people, and will one day form the history and the testimony of your reign. The sentiments of the people of Europe which you receive from the Queen of Great Britain, and the mutual confidence of the two Governments, have happily secured the friendly relations of the two countries. Your Majesty announces to us that the convention recently concluded to put an end to an odious traffic is at this moment being carried into execution. This has realised the wish constantly expressed by the Chamber; the rights of humanity will be more effectually protected, and our commerce will be replaced under the surveillance of our own flag. We trust that France and England, by a united course of action, which has for object to put a stop to the effusion of blood, and to re-establish peace in Spain on a sure and solid basis, will at length restore peace on the banks of the Plata. Faithful to the engagements which it contracts, France has a right to claim respect for treaties. It reminds Europe of the solemn stipulations which have been the basis of its agreements."

The death of M. Zavadiacani, President of the Chamber of Requests at the Court of Cassation, which took place on Monday, is likely to produce a slight modification in the French Cabinet. In the event of M. Zavadiacani's retirement will be made M. Martin du Nord, the present Keeper of the Seals, and Minister of Public Worship. Should M. Martin du Nord become President of the Court of Requests, his probable successor in the latter office will probably be M. Herbert, the present Procureur General in the Cour de Cassation

The hotel of the British embassy at Paris was thrown open on Monday night for Lady Cowley's first ball of the season, and was attended by all that could find Paris contains of rank, beauty, and fashion. To quote the mots of the distinguished company assembled would be literally to name the entire elite of the most elegant society in the capital. The dresses, the decorations, the elegance of the ladies' dresses, brilliant with flowers and diamonds, the other with the various costumes and uniforms of the numerous foreign guests, presented a coup-d'œil truly admirable. The supper was magnificently laid out. Dancing was afterwards resumed, and was kept up to an early hour in the morning.

The Gazette de France states that Prince Louis Bonaparte is about to be restored to liberty, and to join his father, whose health is rapidly declining.

SPAIN

We have accounts from Madrid to the 7th. The chief point of political interest was a manifesto of Don Henri, relative to the marriage of the Queen of Spain. It is announced, that the secretary of Don Henri, who is reported to be the author of the manifesto of the 4th inst. has been ordered to quit Madrid in 24 hours.

Prince and his brother, who had received similar orders, were to leave on the [illegible] These exiles will produce little effect, if there be, as is generally supposed, a party for the purpose of a reconciliation with the Sovereign

The debate in the Chamber of Deputies on the Address was proceeding, but with diminished interest.

UNITED STATES

The Acadia has arrived with the New York papers to the 31st ult. They contain an account of interesting discussions in Congress respecting the Oregon territory. General Cass's resolutions, on which he gave vent to his absurd speech, passed the Senate unanimously. Resolutions were also adopted for raising men for the state of the country's defences, and were not in themselves seriously objectionable. But the sentiments uttered in the course of the debate on these resolutions paved the way for the introduction of others of a most objectionable character. It took place on the introduction of some resolutions by Mr. Hannegan, of Indiana, and which were to the effect that all the country now in dispute is the property and part and parcel of the United States, and that it rests with no power in the American Government to resign or transfer such country, and that the abandonment or surrender of any portion of the territory of Oregon would be an abandonment of the honour, interests, and rights of the citizens of the American people. The discussion of these resolutions came on in the Senate on the 30th, and Mr. Calhoun met them by proposing a series of resolutions as amendments, and which are the very reverse of those of the Indiana senator. The result of the discussion is not known.

MURDER AND SUICIDE AT DINNER.—On Monday night, Mr. W. Payne held an Inquest at the Fountain Tavern, St. George's-road, Southwark, on the body of Mrs Jane Weedon, aged 58 years, wife of a tradesman residing at 71, St. George's-road. The deceased, who had for the last four years suffered more or less from paralysis, on Thursday, on sitting down to her dinner, was suddenly seized with violent convulsions of excitement, and subsequently by a fit, which terminated in death. She expired in a few minutes after.

> Horat.: De Arte Poetica

This couplet contains the recipe for making a perfect newspaper, and consequently the secret of the vast power and importance of modern Journalism. In its infancy the newspaper press was simply a channel for political, social, and commercial intelligence: anon, it transplanted to its columns the flowers of the essayist, and presently we find it rich in the fruits of philosophy and the general harvest of science and literature. Here its purpose seemed accomplished—for, at least, its efforts passed; till, in an happy hour, the idea occurred of carrying out in a journal the effects attributed by the great artist in letters to the actual drama—

> "Segnius irritant animos demissa per aurem > Quam quæ sunt oculis subjecta fidelibus"— which we understood to mean,—

> "The eye interprets best the writer's elocut;"—
> And thereupon ILLUSTRATED OUR NEWS.

High testimony has been lately borne to the correctness of our reading, in connexion with the manner in which we thought it our duty to put before the public certain subjects after nature, having relation to a particular issue in Irish policy. A famous Milesian orator had published, in the form of a series of speeches, a sort of pastoral romance, which might be called "The Happy Valley of Waterville." As time is not in the Utopian era, the leading journal of the empire found it fit to send out an especial Commissioner on a voyage of discovery to settle whether this remnant of the golden age actually existed among the wilds of Kerry or not. The report of that functionary was to the effect that the author of the romance had drawn considerably from fancy, and hinted remarkably couleur de rose. This begot a war of words; and as there was a possibility that the truth might be lost in the din of battle, we despatched our Artist to the scene, that he might be "oculis subjecta fidelibus." The result of his labours, we humbly conceive, has settled the question; and with it the romance of the modern Rasselas. Thus was a good end brought to a good end by a function of great antiquity, and very popular in its nature. It gives a property in wild animals, and that property may be claimed in the land of another to the exclusion of the owner of the land." Matters, to be sure, are somewhat changed since the days of Nimrod, when the beasts and birds of game may prey upon a man's crops, and the sufferer is required to pay a sum of money to the Crown before he may act in self defence. So long the law upholding such a principle must be unpopular in this land of fair play. Englishmen regard sporting as a manly amusement—as a resource of rural enterprise—as the boon recreation of those who dwell "remote from cities." In a British instinct so to feel: our forefathers did so from the first days [illegible] Game preserving will not be suffered to exist as the despotic agent of lettre-de-cachet. Our yeomanry will not foster and feed swarms of pheasants and hares because, as a recent crotchet of bon ton, excessively exclusive persons choose to consume their poultry luxuries in the least seemly operation of their trade. We read, with the respect everything in its columns commands, the observations on the Game-laws which very lately appeared in a contemporary, but it is vain to test their quality by any ordinary standard. You cannot talk of a pheasant as property according to the popular meaning of the term. The producer of a pheasant cannot make use of it without license of the Government. But these matters have nothing to do with the real matter at issue. It is not the use but the abuse of the Game-laws that has caused the movement against them. They have been the head-mill from which the first purpose, to make the instruments of preferment and haughty seclusion. Unless, while yet there is time, those who breed game descend from their stilts, and enter upon a friendly compromise with those who guard them, the day shall find that the Game-laws are by the Franchisers of the Game-laws. Will they wait till we illustrate this subject after the manner of "The Happy Valley of O'Connell"

TATTERSALL'S

MONDAY.—A much better attendance than usual this afternoon, and business, as a consequence, remarkably brisk. For the Chester Cup, we need only refer to the prices which were laid, to £50 each against 14 others to about a score each (!). The Derby betting turned almost exclusively upon Sting, Brocardo, Spitfire, and Fancy Boy; all were backed freely, the first at the quoted odds for choice, Spitfire at 30 and 33 to 1, Brocardo at 40 and 50 to 1, to about £250, and Fancy Boy between £300 and £400, at 33 and 40 to 1. The other transactions were of the Listless. The following were the closing averages.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

A NOVEL RAILWAY CASE. In the VICE-CHANCELLOR'S COURT, on Thursday, [illegible] was heard in the case of Rigby v. The Great Western Railway Company. It was a motion for an injunction, the object of which was to restrain the Great Western Railway Company from allowing certain trains, called "express trains," from passing the station at Swindon, without staying there for the purposes of refreshment. The plaintiffs, Messrs. Rigby, in the year 1841, erected rooms for refreshment and waiting passengers, upon a plot of ground, at the Swindon station. The company, in December of that year, granted to the plaintiffs a lease of the ground [illegible] and stipulated against any other rooms being erected. They provided, that, in the event of the removal of the Swindon Station, or the cessation of its use as a station, they would purchase the rooms at a fair valuation, the value to be ascertained in a particular mode pointed out in the lease. The plaintiffs had [illegible] trains carrying passengers (except those sent by express, or for special purposes, and trains not under the control of the company, and except in cases of emergency or unusual delay arising from accident) should stop at the station for reasonable time, namely, about ten minutes. The rooms were subsequently let by the plaintiffs to Mr. S. T. Griffiths for seven years, at a rent of £1100 per annum. The plaintiffs stipulated that they would enter into covenants and agreements between themselves and the Company for the benefit of Griffiths. The company's trains, called "quick trains," going from London to Exeter in five hours in March, stopped at the Swindon station; but in May, the company announced their intention of running "express" trains between London and Exeter, in four hours and a half, without making any stay at Swindon. They were to commence running on the 12th of May. The train bills, when issued, omitted any allusion to the quick trains, but the express trains were mentioned in the time table. On the 10th of May the plaintiffs filed their bill to restrain the Company from running their trains without stopping at the station. The bill was demurred to, and the case was argued on the 13th and 14th of May, at the residence of the Vice-Chancellor, who refused the injunction. The demurrer was overruled, the Company expressing themselves willing to keep an account of the passengers, and to account for any loss, in consequence of the express trains passing without stopping at the station, provided the Court should ultimately decide that the Company were compellable to stop. Leave was given to the plaintiffs to try the question by actions at law, to one of which actions the defendants were to demur, so as to raise the question as to the effect of the provision of the deed of December, 1841. Two actions were brought in the Court of Exchequer. To one, the Company demurred. The demurrer was overruled, the effect of which was, that the Court decided that the covenant was valid. To the other, the Company pleaded 1st, non est factum; 2ndly, that the Swindon station had been disused as a refreshment room; 3rdly, that the trains were sent by express; 4thly, that they were sent by special purposes; 5thly, that from emergency they could not be detained. On the trial a verdict was found against the Company, by which, in effect, it was established that a breach of the covenant had been committed, by the passage of the trains without stopping.—Counsel having been heard on both sides, Vice-Chancellor Wigram said that, before hearing Mr. Wood's reply in support of the injunction, he should relieve him from two points. He should treat the covenant as binding at law, and he should assume, in the present stage of the proceedings, that these were trains not sent express, and so not within the exception of the covenant. The question then would be as to the effect of the covenant upon the liability of the Company, and, next, as to the partial enforcement of the Agreement against the Company. Thus the matter rests for the present.

DERRYNANE BEG AND CAHIRCIVEEN "ILLUSTRATED."

(From the Times.)

The fame of these localities is increasing. Not only have the pen of our "Commissioner" and the particular descriptions of our reporter given them historic reputation, but now the artist has contributed his skill to "illustrate" to the eye the wretched abodes of the Kerry tenantry who have the misfortune to exist under Mr. O'Connell as a landlord. Description appeals to "the mind's eye;" but "illustration" to the eye itself. Description labours under great comparative disadvantages. Not only must it be terse, vivid, and graphic, to force itself on the mind the reality, but it must also have that quality about it which will excite an interest sufficient to awaken the attention of the reader to receive piecemeal and consecutively the impressions intended to be conveyed. But illustration places before us the whole picture at one view; the mind, without the labour of attention, at once is master of what is beautiful or picturesque, or wretched, and forms its judgment at a glance. In this respect the artist has the advantage over the man of literature.

To ourselves, however, it is not a little flattering that the vivid descriptions of our "Commissioner" of the condition of O'Connell's wretched tenantry have excited such an interest that the enterprising conductors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS have been induced to despatch to "the O'Connell property" in Kerry one of their artists, to "illustrate" and picture to the eye those scenes which our columns have exposed to the gaze of the world. But for us the systematic descriptions of the impostor O'Connell would have gone on, for no Irish newspaper dared to expose them. He would have continued to deceive the people in Ireland, by unblushing assertions that he "is the best—the kindest of landlords—the refuge of the poor," and so forth; and would have won popularity by the indiscriminate abuse of negligent landlords and middlemen. Now, however, on such an apprentice or a shopboy in the United Kingdom but estimates him at his true worth, as a "great middleman" and negligent landlord; for look! there, on the page of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS is the picture, both inside and out, of the wretched hovels of his tenantry.

Our "Illustrated" contemporary introduces the subject by stating:—

"The great interest excited by the 'proven' account of the condition of the tenantry of the O'Connell estate, by the Times Commissioner, has induced us to despatch an artist to the spot, to sketch the principal localities so vividly described in the above communications. Our artist's report is almost exclusively graphic; for he has appended to his sketches a few pencil notes, of which we avail ourselves. The Times Commissioner, our artist tells us, 'is in the mouths of all here, from the cat-driver to the landlord, and from him down to the humblest labourer's child in the country.'"

The first sketch given is of the town of Cahriveen. In this the artist has shown a painter's judgment. It is an admirable sketch of the Killarney entrance to the town, which is its best aspect. The convent, the court-house, and the Roman Catholic chapel, grouped together, have a fair appearance. Beyond these public buildings, the rest of the town is judiciously left in the shade. The second sketch gives the immortalised hotel of Cahriveen, of bull-calf renown. It is the style of house—nay, the house itself. A ray of sunshine across its front, and the even lines of the draughtsman have, however, given it a symmetry and proportion, a brightness of look, which, in the centre of the dingy looking street in the sketch above, the reality cannot boast. But it is an amiable fault of artists to flatter. There is not a doubt, however, but the exact condition of this town will eventually be as well known as St. Paul's. The Census Commissioners of 1841 will aid us in obtaining this knowledge, for they have especially noticed "the barony of Iveragh, in the county of Kerry, which contains the town of Cahriveen and the O'Connell property. "The inhabitants of this barony," they say, "are living in a very low state as to household accommodation." To show this, they have classified the houses into four classes. "In the lowest or fourth class, are comprised all mud cabins, having only one room; in the third, a better description of cottage, still built of mud, but varying from two to four rooms, and windows; in the second, a good farm house, or in towns, a house as a small street, having from five to nine rooms, and windows; and in the first, all houses of a better description than the preceding classes." On turning to page 198 of the Census, we find the statistics of the houses of the barony of Iveragh, Cahir parish:—

CLASSIFICATION OF HOUSES.

	First Class.	Second Class.	Third Class.	Fourth Class.	Total.
Rural portion	4	22	194	634	854
Cahriveen-town	15	132	38	29	215

So that it appears there are 215 houses in Cahriveen, only 15 of which are first-class, or good houses; 132 of them are of the character "of houses in a small street, with five to nine rooms" just such a street as the artist's first sketch exhibits; whilst the remainder of the houses, 67 in number, are in the third and fourth classes, viz., mud cabins, with two rooms and one room, the latter without window. But what a spectacle does the "rural portion" of Cahriveen parish present—nearly the whole of which is Mr. O'Connell's property, and the boasted portion of it. Out of 854 houses, 634 are mud cabins of one room and no windows, and 194 with only two rooms and windows, whilst out of 854 houses, there are but 26 in the first and second class of houses—that is, good farm houses. The statistical "illustration" is nearly as good as the Granghamun's.

The next sketch is of the interior of one of these cabins. This is not so happy indeed, how could the artist are to sketch its internal misery, in the midst of the smoke and the darkness. The defined outline of the roof in this sketch, and its accurately placed timbers, have a look of order far rather than of chaos. There is a dark and undefined mysteriousness about the roughly placed and smoke blackened timbers of the genuine thing, as the smoke curls under the roof, which the draughtsman even cannot imitate—it must be left to imagination. The interior, too, shows the luxury of space, which the originals boast not. No cottage is twice the length of the cow inside in breadth. There, however, are the cow, and the pig, and the lazy men. Only the artist's fancy has given imagination had placed a broom inside an article a Kerry peasant in all probability never saw, and most certainly never uses.

The next sketch is of "Valentia from Ferry Point," has our unqualified admiration, as also has the sketch of the clean and comfortable Valentia Hotel. The sketch of Derrynane, of Waterville, and of Chvane's House, are also very accurate. The small house in the foreground to the right of the sketch of the road from Waterville, if not the identical cottage of the wife of Galason, on Mr. O'Connell's fee simple property of Tarmons, which our reporter describes as "built of loose stones, without mortar or cement, and thatched with half rotten potato stalks and rushes, with an opening 3½ feet high by 2½ broad, for which she paid 2s. rent," and into which cottage he had great difficulty to squeeze himself to "inspect the naked walls, a heap of stones covered with an old mat—a bed by night, a seat by day—some old turf baskets, an iron pot, some cocks and hens, a woman crouching over a few sods of turf, and three children sprawling on the heather, which was laid on the mud floor to soak up the wet," is the exact picture of it, only it wants the cesspool and dungheap in front

On the whole, the sketches are highly creditable, and we can vouch (with the qualifications mentioned) for their general accuracy. The poor Kerry peasants must have wondered "what next!" and have thought the world coming to an end, to find a London artist down amongst them "sketching" their squalor. This instance, however, of interprise on the part of the proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS deserves our commendation, and we need not add that we feel much flattered by it.

 We acknowledge that we feel proud of the commendation bestowed by our powerful contemporary upon our efforts to illustrate the scenes which have been so carefully, and, we believe, accurately described, by "the Times Commissioner."

ELEGY ON THE DEATH OF EIGHT HUNDRED RAILWAYS.

Once Cowper's Muse was heard to sing,
By tune of Cowper's pen,
How "gallant Kempenfelt went down
With twice four hundred men."

Now we have got a Railway Muse
Who's haunted in her dreams,
Because the Panic has gone down
With twice four hundred Schemes.

The Royal George may be got up
Tho' it was doom'd to drown,
But a Company that's once got up
And afterwards got down,

Is lost along with all its scrip.
One drinks a bitter cup,
In losing shares, yet so it is,
Once down it is all up.

Eight-hundred Railway Schemes are dead—
Let Gamblers pipe their eye,
They may be sure their day was cast
When they were cast to die.

Eight-hundred Schemes that once bade fair
To bring a brave amount,
Are gone—to the Accountant's? No,
But to their last account!

Mourn, gentles, mourn, Eight-hundred Schemes
That to the grave have past;
They faulted so long upon their way,
They are de funct at last!

Poor Schemes! Their birth was very fair—
They play'd their pretty tricks
One morning in the newspapers,
As soon as half-past six!

We seldom see at one grand burst
So many Projectors,
Put out no doubt to hunt the blunt
Of low airs and of high airs!

Eight hundred Railways! How they rose
In general estimation—
It was their noble end to link
The ends of all the nation!

Their end is now one Railway grave—
No Kensal-green of clover—
Ended is all they undertook;
In fact, it is all over!

At first they skipp'd like things alive,
To over-run and vermin us;—
In their beginning all was life,
But death was at the terminus!

At first on flags in Capel-court,
You never saw a frown fall;
But, oh, my eyes! how down they look'd
When they perceived their downfall!

At first, in every man there shone
A boaster and a bragger,
But, ah! you saw the very stags,
At last turn round and stagger.

Panic came forth with haggard brow,
Her palsying and her pale ways;
'Tin wouldn't stump, and not a dump
Of Premium cheer'd the Railways.

Deposit day swept gauntly on—
It wouldn't bear inspection,
And you might see directors fly
In every direction.

Call went unanswer'd—money down
Forsook the human vision;
Provisional Committees now
Were quite without provision!

The 80th came: ah! yes it did,
And everybody knows it did—
For wors'ning the deposits then,
The plans were not deposited.

Eight Hundred schemes! how blank they look,
As though to-day were Gloom's day;
They're registered in Doomsday Book,
And wont come out till doomsday!

Eight hundred fetters knock'd away
From limbs of Speculation,
To some may be a 'nation' loss,
But no loss to the Nation!

IRELAND.

THE REPEAL ASSOCIATION. The weekly meeting of the Repeal Association was held on Monday, Dr Nagle in the chair. Mr O'Connell, having handed in a number of remittances, announced the adhesion of Charles Tottenham, Esq., of Addison-road, London, to the Repeal cause, and stated that that gentleman, connected with one of the most respectable families in Ireland, had resigned his commission of the peace for the county Wexford, where his property was situated, previous to his becoming a Repealer. Mr M'Keon acquainted the meeting, that, in travelling from London a few days since, in company with an English gentleman, the conversation turned on the Repeal agitation, and his companion inquired "What Mr. O'Connell did with all the money he received?" On his (Mr M'Keon's) arrival in Dublin, he introduced his English gentleman to Mr. O'Connell, and at his instance the books of the association were thrown open to him, and so perfectly satisfied was he with the accuracy of the accounts and the expenditure of the funds, that he subscribed £1 "in aid of the cause of an oppressed country."—Mr. O'Connell moved all the many Repeal Members of Parliament as possible should attend next Monday's meeting, to deliberate on the course they should pursue on the opening of Parliament.—The amount of the rent for the week was £164 2s. 8d.

The late Mr D Kelly, of Cargins, Roscommon, has left his widow £600,000. The will is to be contested. Limerick Chronicle

DEATH OF SIR JOSEPH BARRINGTON, BART. A letter from Limerick, dated Jan. 14, says: "We are concerned to announce the death of one of our oldest resident citizens, Sir Joseph Barrington, who departed this life at his house in Barrington street, this morning, in the 82nd year of his age. The name of this respected old gentleman will long be associated with the establishment of Barrington's Hospital, and City Infirmary, which asylum of mercy for the sick poor he founded, and with his sons, assisted to endow, for the benefit of the present and future generations. Matthew Barrington, Esq., Crown Solicitor of Munster, eldest son of the deceased, and now Sir Matthew Barrington, Bart., succeeds to that title originally conferred upon his venerated parent by his late Majesty William IV."

SUICIDE OF CAPTAIN BAKER.—Captain Baker, of the 5th Fusileers, committed suicide on Thursday (last week), at Kilmainham. Between six and seven o'clock, he sent his servant up the town for some medicine, and on his return up stairs he heard the report of a musket. On entering he found his unhappy master lying on the floor, and the top of the skull blown off, he having placed the firelock under his chin, and pulled the trigger with his toes. The reports are various as to the cause that led to this calamity. The deceased was observed to be greatly agitated during the evening. The deceased was gazetted to a company by purchase on the 30th of December. Colonel Conroy has held an inquest on the body in the barrack, and after the examination of Captain Baker's servant, Dr Mackay, Adjutant Lyons, and Captain Kennedy, the jury brought in a verdict of "Temporary Insanity." Captain Baker was a young man, much esteemed, and greatly beloved by both men and officers: he was a native of Cork.

DEPLORABLE CASE OF POISONING IN NEWTOWN-HAMILTON.—AN OCCURRENCE of the most tragic character has cast a deep gloom over the inhabitants of this little town. An individual, named Close, some twenty years ago married a lady named Jefferson, of a respectable family, residing near Forkhill. The lives of the couple were not distinguished for that unity and affection which should subsist between husband and wife. Close is the father of a deeply afflicted boy by a former marriage. The most serious differences existed between Close and his wife, particularly for the last few months, and all effects of which remain to be told. He purchased arsenic; and by whatever means it was administered, on Monday morning week, about ten o'clock, the wife became very ill, and, after three hours' excruciating suffering, closed her career in this world. The above are the main facts, as they were elicited at two very protracted investigations before the Coroner, Mr. Henry, which took place in that town on Tuesday and Wednesday (last week), and which resulted in the committal of the unfortunate man to gaol on the latter night.

LEGAL CHANGES IN IRELAND. It is stated that Mr Brewster, the advising counsel to the Government, is to be the new Solicitor-General. Mr. Blackburne, the new Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, cannot take his seat in that court until his patent shall have been made out. Mr. Blackburne, as chief justice, is to go the home circuit as one of the judges of assize.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

THE EARL GRANVILLE.

Granville Leveson Gower, Earl Granville, was second son of Granville, first Marquis of Stafford, by the Lady Susannah, his wife, daughter of Alexander, sixth Earl of Galloway. He was born, 12th October, 1773, and had, consequently, at the period of his decease, completed his seventy-second year.

From a very early age, his Lordship took an active part in public affairs. On attaining his majority, he entered Parliament as Knight of the Shire for the County of Stafford, and, attracting the favourable regard of Mr. Pitt, was, in a few years after, appointed a Lord of the Treasury. He remained, however, a brief time only in the same services. With a mind of peculiar acuteness, manners the most pleasing, and great uprightness of purpose, Lord Granville Leveson Gower was peculiarly adapted to play a distinguished rôle in the diplomacy of Europe; and, at the critical epoch when Napoleon was exerting all his skull to gain over the Emperor Alexander, he became our Ambassador at the Court of St. Petersburgh. Here his endeavours proved of essential service to his country, and he remained for several years British Representative in the Russian capital.

He was subsequently accredited Envoy at the Hague; and eventually —on the accession of the Grey Administration—received the high and distinguished appointment of Ambassador at Paris: an appointment he did not finally resign until the extinction of the Melbourne Ministry. During his residence at the French Court, Lord Granville maintained, with great splendour, the characteristic hospitality of his country, and gained such universal esteem, that the news of his death seemed to cause as much regret in Paris as in London.

In 1815, he was created Viscount Granville, and in 1833, raised to the Earldom. He married, 24th Dec., 1809, Henrietta Elizabeth, daughter of William, fifth Duke of Devonshire; and had issue by her two sons and two daughters, viz., Granville George, Lord Leveson (present Earl); Edward Frederick; Susan Georgiana, married to Lord Rivers; and Georgiana Charlotte, wife of Alexander George Fullerton, Esq., of Ballintoy Castle, County Antrim.

Lord Granville died on Wednesday, the 6th, after a long and painful illness.

GENERAL JOHN STUDHOLME HODGSON.

This distinguished officer, whose death it is our painful duty this week to record, was son of Field-Marshal Studholme Hodgson, so well known as Commander of the expedition which took Belleisle from the French in 1761. His mother, Catherine, was sister of Sir George Howard, K.B., Governor of Chelsea Hospital, and aunt of the late Earl of Effingham. Destined for the military service, he obtained, in 1779, his commission of Ensign, in the King's Own Regiment, his father's corps, and left Harrow School to join head-quarters in Canada. There he acted for some years under the auspices of Lord Dorchester, and was employed as Major of Brigade at the reduction of the Islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon. On two occasions he was taken prisoner at sea: on his second capture, which was effected by a French privateer, he sank the colours of "the King's Own," to rescue them from the enemy's hands. He remained a prisoner until October, 1798, when he was exchanged.

In the following year he proceeded to Holland, in command of the 4th Regiment, and was present at the taking of the town and garrison of Hoorn, and in the actions of the 2nd and 6th of October. At Egmont of Sea, he received a dangerous wound, and never had the ball extracted. He was subsequently nominated Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the Bermudas, and afterwards of Curacoa, the government of which island he retained until its restoration to the Dutch. On his return home, he was presented with the Colonelcy of the 3rd Garrison Battalion; in 1822, exchanged it for the command of the 83rd Foot. In 1830 was removed, by special command of William IV., to the distinguished regiment of which he died Colonel.

General Hodgson, who preserved to the end the buoyancy and energy which had characterized him through life, fell a victim at last to the ardour with which he continued to follow his favourite pursuit of shooting. He was married, and has left several children.

BRITISH MUSEUM.—RESTORATION OF THE PARTHENON.

Last week, we briefly announced the placing in the British Museum of a pair of Models—the Parthenon, as it appeared after the siege in 1687; and the Parthenon restored; by Mr. R. C. Lucas, the sculptor. As these Models promise to be the most popular additions lately made to the Museum, we have entered one of them—the Temple in its dilapidated state; and enlarged illustrations of the pediments restored: together with the only figures now remaining in either of the pediments. By aid of a volume of able "Remarks," just published by Mr. Lucas, and embodying his studies and inquiries connected with the restoration of these Models, we shall be enabled to present to our readers a few notes on the history and description of this most perfect of temples.

The Sculpture of the Parthenon, popularly known as "the Elgin Marbles," has long been more or less appreciated by every visitor to the British Museum; and the increasing love for the treasures of Art, placed in a position in it for the purpose, a few years since, has just been perfected by the addition of the above Models; the completed building serving "as a Key to the matchless remains, which are so many of the original parts, and an important element of this restoration."

With the unrivalled excellence of the sculpture, the surrounding masses became familiarised, some years since, by means of their illustration in the "Library of Entertaining Knowledge." In the Report of the Committee appointed by the House of Commons to examine these works, it is well observed that "if it be true, as we learn from history and experience, that free Governments afford a soil most suitable to the production of native talent, to the maturing of the powers of the human mind, and to the growth of every species of excellence, by opening to merit the prospect of reward and distinction; no country can be better adapted than our own to afford a suitable asylum to those monuments of the school of Pericles and of the administration of Pericles, where, secure from further injury and degradation, they may receive the admiration and homage to which they are entitled, and serve in return as models and examples to those who, by knowing how to revere and appreciate them, may learn to imitate, and, ultimately, to rival them."

More recently, Professor Welcker has borne the following testimony:

"The British Museum possesses, in the works of Phidias, a treasure with which nothing can be compared in the whole range of ancient art. Honour belongs to all civilised countries and all educated individuals; but the Homer of the plastic art is, in a certain sense, to be found in the works of Phidias alone, and, among the statues of the Pediments stand pre-eminent, and, formerly, they were more so, in their separate combinations. The individual figures in each composition acquire, by their position, the character and meaning by which they are to be estimated; and the greater the genius which produced them, the more important does it become accurately to comprehend the thoughts and intentions, as expressed both in the whole and in all its particulars. The greatness of Phidias, as a sculptor, has been universally acknowledged with admiration; but if we may judge from the careless and superficial manner in which many of his figures and compositions have been treated, his power of invention and his sagacity seem to have been greatly undervalued."

It is well known that the Parthenon the most refined example of the Grecian Doric style, and one of the noblest monuments of antiquity, was erected on the summit of the Acropolis at Athens, B. C. 445, in the most flourishing and glorious period of that great republic, in the time of her greatest statesman, Pericles; and from the designs of the greatest sculptor and the most celebrated architect of the ancient world, Phidias and Ictinus. Its dimensions were 227 feet in length by 101 feet in breadth, being little more, as to length, than the size of the Elgin Hall, in the British Museum, viz., 145 by 46 feet. Thus, we see that the grandeur of the Parthenon was, by no means, derived from its extraordinary dimensions: nay, it was considerably less than the new church of the Madeleine, at Paris, the dimensions of which are 328 feet by 138.

The Parthenon was constructed entirely of Pentelic marble, and, including a splendid flight of five steps into this part of the building, which was called the Pronaos at the east, and the Posticus at the west end, and these appartments were level with the cella. The interior of the Temple was divided into two unequal chambers: the western part was called the Opisthodomus, and was used as the Public Treasury; it occupied the length of 44 feet within the building, and its breadth was 62 feet and a half. The eastern part, called the Chamber of the Virgin Goddess, was in length 98 feet 9 inches, and its roof was supported by a double tier of columns, the lower of which measured about 3 feet 6 inches at the base."

In this Eastern Chamber was placed the stupendous chryselephantine statue of its goddess, 39 feet high, exclusive of the pedestal; and whose golden ornaments, on her vestments of ivory, constituted no inconsiderable portion of the riches of the nation. The internal appearance of the Temple was sublime; its external aspect, grand and imposing:

EASTERN PEDIMENT OF THE PARTHENON.

> "As wandering slow, in dread Minerva's fane,
> Charm'd with the beauties of the land and main,
> The past return'd—the present seem'd to cease—
> And Glory knew no clime beyond her Greece."

"This beautiful building remained in all its integrity for 600 years; for Plutarch, who lived A. D. 148, in the time of Hadrian, speaks of its sculpture as having then all the beauty of freshness; and, as the barbarous conqueror Alaric respected the majesty of the Parthenon, we have no reason to infer that it sustained any injury from the hand of man till the sixth century A. D., when the supposition is, that the central portion of the eastern pediment was removed by the Christians, either from iconoclastic zeal, or in order to let light into the interior, which they had converted into a church; and, of the sculpture then removed, not the least memorial exists."

Strange to say, this wonder of art was unnoticed in Europe for nearly 1500 years, or till the year 1675, when drawings were made by Carrey of its beautiful sculptures then remaining; and to these drawings alone can we look for any information of the composition of the western pediment, or the general magnificence of the sculpture; for, in 1687, the cella was used as a powder-magazine by the Turks, at the time of their city being besieged by the Venetians, by whom a shell was thrown on the roof; this burst through, and caused an explosion of the combustible materials within, demolishing a portion of the side walls, with six columns on one side, and seven on the other, with several of the metopes, and a portion of the frieze. The western front was likewise then injured by the fire of the besiegers, as well as by their removal of some of the finest sculptures from the pediment, which, however, were broken to pieces. One of the Models shows the Temple as it appeared after this explosion.

In this state of dilapidation, the Parthenon remained until visited by Stuart and Revett, (the English architects,) in 1751; who saw in the western pediment, the figure of Ilissus and the torso of the group of Cecrops and Agraulus—all that were left of the twenty-two statues which Carrey had drawn about sixty years before. The eastern pediment was left comparatively perfect, wanting nothing but the great central portion removed by the Christians in the sixth century. On their return to England, Messrs. Stuart and Revett published a magnificent work on Athens; this first gave to Europe a general knowledge of the sculptures of the Parthenon, which has been much increased by the researches of Col. Leake, Mr. Cockerell, and the Chevalier Bronsted.

The work of the dilapidation of the Parthenon was continued by the Turks till the visit of Lord Elgin, who removed the chief portion of the sculpture, now in the British Museum. It would otherwise have been destroyed by the Turks: "Still," says Mr. Lucas, "the removal of any sculpture would never have been contemplated by Lord Elgin, if the present period in the history of the Parthenon could have been foreseen, which is, that the Greeks, having achieved their independence, now use the edifice as a hall of science; and thus the Greeks of these later days, as did Alaric of old, revere the majesty of the Parthenon."

The only descriptive notice of the sculptural compositions left us by the ancients, is the scanty notice of Pausanias—that in the eastern pediment, the competition relates to the creation of Minerva; in the western pediment, to the contest of Minerva and Neptune for the territory of Attica. This notice, the drawings of Carrey, and the sculptures still remaining in the Museum, have been Mr. Lucas's main authorities in the restoration of

THE WESTERN PEDIMENT.

In the centre stood the figures of Minerva and Neptune, in grand contrasted action. This is from the remark of Pausanias; but Carrey's drawing shows it to be the victory of Minerva rather than the actual contest. To the right of the Goddess was a chariot drawn by two horses, and held in by a draped female figure. At the side of the car stood a male figure, Erechtæus, of which the torso, No. 100, in the Elgin Room, is the only remnant. Then, a group of three personages: the Goddess Demeter, draped and seated, and Persephone, draped and standing; the boy Bacchus between them. Beyond these are the majestic reclining torsos of Vulcan and Venus, or Hercules and Hebe, or Cecrops and Agraulus, of which casts have recently been sent to the British Museum from Athens. Next, in the extreme angle of the pediment, is the graceful figure of Iris; in the space between which and the group of Vulcan and Venus must have been some other figure, not in Carrey's drawing. In the opposite portion of the pediment, on the other side of the central group, is first a draped female figure in rapid action, to which, probably, belonged the magnificent cast lately placed in the Museum; between which figure and Neptune we must supply, as Welcker has shown, a car of hippocampi. Next to this female figure is Amphitrite, reining in the hippocampi, corresponding with the female figure on the car of Minerva. Next to her is a seated female figure, draped, (the torso in the Elgin Room, No. 106,) with two naked children, known either as Latona and her children, Apollo and Diana; or, as Leucothea, Melicerta, and Eros. Then, Aphrodite, seated on the lap of her mother Dione; and next is Pitho, crowning the former. Beyond these is a space, whence the sculpture has been removed. Then, a male figure, kneeling; and, in the angle of the pediment, Calirrhoe, as a female reclining figure, balancing the Ilissus in the opposite angle, and thus allegorizing the two streams of Greece. Mr. Lucas refers to the conviction of consummate skill and daring on the part of Phidias, left on our minds by this pediment: all is bold, free, and unrammelled; and in the groups forming one entire composition, we perceive the great principle in the design of Phidias—namely, variety and contrast in unity. Though within the rules of pedimental composition, the idea of rule is lost in the perfectness of the result. The dissimilar size of the figures gives to the central group the importance of divinity; and the propriety of the treatment is evident, whether as an embellishment of sculpture, or as an architectural enrichment. The only parts of this pediment that have escaped destruction are the chest and back of Neptune, in the Elgin Room, No. 103; the torso of the god Erechtæus, a fragment of the breast and face of Minerva, the graceful figure of Ilissus, part of the group of Latona, and a fragment of the hippocampi. These are preserved in the Museum, as memorials rich in themselves, and also valuable as historical records; and their aid to Mr Lucas's restoration is most artistically appreciated by him.

We are compelled, by our limits, to omit the meaning of the myth; and pass on to

THE EASTERN PEDIMENT.

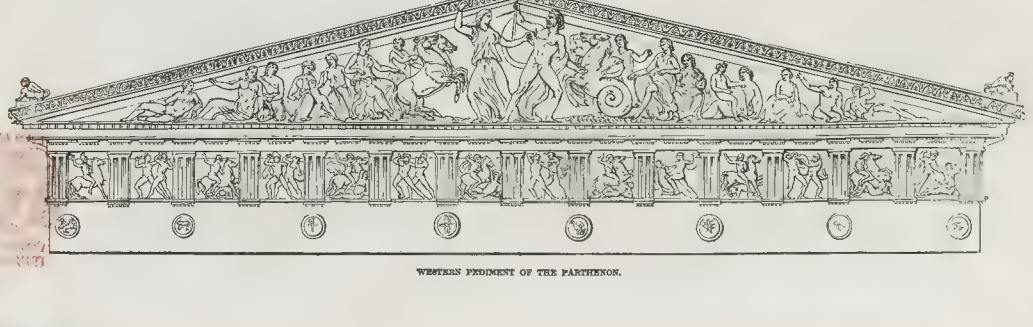
Here Mr. Lucas adopts the opinion of Flaxman, that the composition represents Minerva introduced to the gods on Olympus; a view also taken by Mr. Cockerell, who has demonstrated that the fragment on the floor of the Elgin Room was the base of the statue of Minerva—a judgment in which M. Welcker entirely coincides. These fragments, now in the Museum, though in themselves the most important, and of all the remains of ancient art, the most justly celebrated, constitute but a small portion of the entire sculpture of the eastern pediment. They consist of seven distinct subjects—three groups, three distinct figures, and one part of the group of the Car of Night. In the south angle of the pediment are Hyperion and the Horses of the Day rising out of the sea, who seeming to rough with impatience—a fragment of great breadth and power. Next is the figure variously known as Theseus, Hercules, Cephalus, or Cecrops—reclining in dignified repose; "above all other statues," says Mr. Lucas, "the most noble type of man." The next group is differently interpreted; Visconti considering it as Ceres and her daughter Proserpine; and Col. Leake, as the Attic Thallo and the Horæ; the intention of Phidias in the treatment is, however, plain—the upraised arm of the mother is evidently directing the attention of the daughter to the event in the centre of the composition; the group is full of grandeur and beauty; and admirably adapted to its situation in the pediment.

The next figure, Iris, or the messenger, Mr. Lucas considers as marking the space assigned by Phidias for the superior Divinities, as the corresponding space on the opposite side was filled by the figure of Victory; equally separating the ends of the pediment from the central composition, believed to have been composed of the grand assemblage of Divinities worshipped in Attica, and removed in the early times, from being so peculiarly obnoxious as records of an idolatrous worship. The next figure of Victory, not being equally obnoxious, was allowed to remain; and was followed by the splendid group of the Fates, which interpretation Mr. Lucas adopts in preference to those which regard these figures as the Hours, and as the Graces. Next was placed the figure of Selene, or Night; and to her car was, as an appendage, the magnificent horse's head in the Museum. "Of all this sculpture," says Mr. Lucas, "undeviating excellence is the marked characteristic; the only monument of human skill that is above human criticism or praise."

Thus, from the remaining fragments, from Carrey's drawings, and by supplying the blanks upon inference, warranted by their artistic propriety, has Mr. Lucas reconstructed the compositions of the two pediments. He has drawn from them, too, the important lesson of suiting the size and projection of the figures to their places in the pediments; whereas, says Mr Lucas, "I have the highest authority for stating that not one modern pediment has been constructed in accordance with the rules which this pediment of Phidias prescribes to us; and as to the sufficiency of this example as a rule, we have the united testimony of all authorities on the subject, that this pedimental construction contained the result of seven hundred years' experience,—and that used by the discretion of Phidias." This is "a great fact" for the sculptors of our day.

By rules equally scrupulous and acute has Mr. Lucas proceeded in perfecting the frieze on the outer wall of the cella, from existing remains; supplying the missing metopes from coins and vases; and the replacement of the shields from similar authorities; whilst the double row of interior columns is restored, and the Goddess replaced in her shrine, as seen on coins and gems. The polychromatic decoration of the interior is omitted. The frieze of the Parthenon—a procession in honour of Minerva—as a connected subject, was the largest and most beautiful ever executed. It was 524 feet in length: of the original, the British Museum possesses 264 feet, and casts of about 128 feet; the only part remaining on the building is that above the western vestibule; but, from these sources, and Carrey's drawing, the entire work may be understood.

Mr. Lucas adds:—"All the sculpture in the Museum from the Parthenon is of course included in this model, and also the drawings of Carrey; while the investigations of Bronsted, Cockerell, and Col. Leake will be added by the elaborate drawings by De La Borde, who has spent the last year in investigating and preparing for publication the metopes now remaining on the Parthenon. To this must be added the recent arrival of the valuable casts, including all the architectural members, the noble group of Hercules and Hebe, and also the parts of twelve additional slabs of the frieze. We may, therefore, rest satisfied that every part of the Parthenon, as it now is, can have no more light thrown on it. The case is different as regards the parts lost by the explosion, as in the number of the French Archæological Journal, published in May, 1845, a notice and two engravings are given of a head, stated to have been that of the Victory in the western pediment, brought to Venice by an officer who served under Morosini.



WESTERN PEDIMENT OF THE PARTHENON.

HERCULES AND HEBE.—FROM THE PARTHENON.

It ornamented some garden edifice for the last century, and it is now an object of competition to obtain the same for the various Museums in Europe."

We have engraved the Hercules and Hebe, of which figures casts have been just placed in the Elgin Saloon. These are the only figures now remaining in either of the pediments of the Parthenon; they belong to the western pediment, where (according to some) they formed the group placed next to the reclining figure of Ilyssus, which occupied the extreme angle.

At the time Lord Elgin removed the other figures, these were in considerably better condition than at present; both heads have since perished; the reason they were allowed to remain was that the upper portion was supposed to be a Roman restoration: the group is, certainly, formed of two blocks of marble, the union of which may be distinctly traced in the drawing; but the same grandeur of style is perceptible in the one part as in the other, placing the authenticity of the work beyond all doubt.

The head of Victory, mentioned as above, in Mr. Lucas's work, was engraved in a late No. of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS: a cast of the same has been presented to the British Museum by Count de la Borde.

The size of M. Lucas's models is about 12ft. by 6ft., respectively.

RESTORATION OF THE CHURCH OF ST. MARY MAGDALENE, TAUNTON.

The olden glory of ancient Taunton, "one of the eyes of the county" of Somerset, is the Church of St. Mary Magdalene, among the finest specimens of Gothic architecture in the west of England. It stands nearly in the centre of the town, at the end of Hammet-street, opposite a fine open parade; from which its splendid tower is seen to good effect, and is universally admired.

The circumstances of the history of this fine church, and the exact date of its erection, have not been precisely ascertained. Neither Dugdale, Tanner, Camden, nor Gough take any notice of the first erection of St. Mary's; "and it is rather singular," says Mr. Britton, in his Architectural Antiquities, "that neither Drs. Tonkins, Collier, nor Savage, could obtain any document relative to the age of the tower; neither does Leland, or Camden, or Gough, furnish us with anything even like a hint to lead us to a discovery;" although the tower is the most magnificent feature of this fine ecclesiastical edifice. It is, however, believed that a church must have existed on the same site long prior to the Norman Conquest. Taunton, from its contiguity to the Abbey at Glastonbury, would, no doubt, soon partake of its Christian benefits; and we know that Taunton was a town of no small importance in the 7th century; for here was a castle, the residence of a Christian King, who held here a great council, composed of the Bishops, Clergy, Nobles, and Commons of his kingdom. Again, the flint and rubble foundations upon which the present church stands, evidently belong to a former edifice, a Saxon church, which, by repeated alterations, was changed into the Norman style and character. The oldest part of these remains lies beneath the piers of the north and south transepts: the columns supporting the chancel-arch, and the plain square abacus, like those we often see crowning the Anglo-Saxon pier, from which springs the semi-circular arch:—these are the only remains, both of the Anglo-Saxon and Anglo-Norman structures—the first erected before the end of the 7th century, and, it is believed, changed into the latter style some time in the 11th. The next portion of the church, in point of antiquity, is of the 13th century, in the early English style; but the greater part of the building is of the floral, or perpendicular style, which was not introduced until about 1375. The tower is the best specimen of this style, and corresponds with that of St. Michael's, Coventry; Merton College Chapel, Oxford; and with some of the windows in the tower of Fotheringhay Church, Northamptonshire, whose date is 1434. Another fine feature of the design is the south porch, which is of very elegant and elaborate construction: in the front are niches for statuary; the ceiling is groined with fan tracery, and a small chamber, (parvise,) is constructed over it: it is crowned with a perforated parapet, and on the angles are crocketed pinnacles. This beautiful porch is shown in our Engraving, (a south-west view,) as is, also, the lofty and richly-light tower, which must have taken many years to complete: "it is clear, however, that the original design was never departed from, the same order prevailing through the whole. Its being built in the perpendicular style is a proof that its erection was commenced after the introduction of that style, and was finished before it began to degenerate into the debased English. The tower is the best specimen of the florid, or perpendicular, and was built when this style was in its greatest perfection." The plan of the church is very large; and one peculiar feature in its construction is, that it has a nave and four aisles; "there are but a few of a similar arrangement in this country, and we are only able to mention two—those of Kendal, in Westmoreland; and St. Michael's, in Coventry."

Warton, in his notes to Spenser's "Fairy Queen," vol. ii., p. 258, thus refers to the fine church at Taunton: "Most of the churches in Somersetshire, (which are remarkably elegant,) are in the style of the Florid Gothic. The reason is this: Somersetshire, in the civil wars between York and Lancaster, was strongly and entirely attached to the Lancastrian party. In reward for this service, Henry VII., when he came to the Crown, rebuilt their churches. The tower of Gloucester Cathedral, and the towers of Taunton and Glastonbury, and of a parochial church, (St. Cuthbert's,) at Wells, are conspicuous examples of that fashion. Most of the churches of this reign are known, besides other distinctions, by latticed battlements and broad open windows."

It would scarcely be credited that so splendid a specimen of the piety and skill of our forefathers as St. Mary's, at Taunton, should have been suffered to fall into decay; especially when the architecture of our own time fails to produce any work to be placed in comparison with this superb pile. Yet, on the appointment of the Rev. Dr. Cottle to the vicarage, in 1840, he found this church, from age and neglect, to be in a most dangerous and dilapidated condition: "it was quite evident that[unless something should be speedily done, divine service could not be conducted in it with safety to the congregation." Several attempts had been made to repair the edifice, but in vain; yet, nothing discouraged, the worthy Vicar commenced the great work by getting the parish to do as much as possible, and undertaking the rest on his own responsibility; "trusting to the Great Head of the Church for His blessing and assistance to enable him to carry out such plans as would best advance the welfare of his parishioners, and most redound to His glory."

We may here briefly describe the interior of the church: it consists of a chancel, nave, four aisles, and two small chantries: the extreme length from the screen to the altar being 160ft 7in.; and the total width, from north wall to south, 85ft 7in. We have not room to detail the works of restoration, but, seeing that the windows, walls, and roofs were in a dangerous condition, and the floor uneven, the cost must have been great: it is very even drainage and foundations to be provided; besides every description of repair, substantial as well as ornamental. Among the new fittings is some well-executed carving in oak, as the nave-screen; open seats, with stall-ends and poppy heads, in the nave, aisles, and transepts; stalls in the chancel, separated from the aisles by light and elegant screens; a decorated reliquit; enriched stone font and altar-screen; and the large eastern window filled with stained glass, by Wailes, of Newcastle. The whole of the windows were once so decorated, realising the thought so beautifully expressed by Faber:

> "I saw the sunbeams steal
> Through painted glass at even-song, and weave
> Their threefold dints upon the marble near > Faith, prayer, and love."

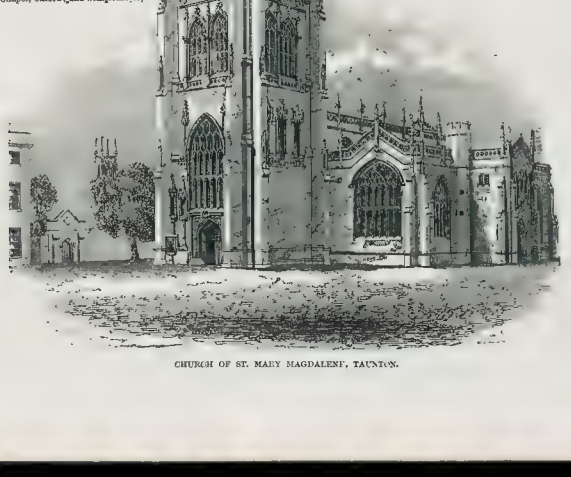
It is not, however, within our compass to detail this now beautiful interior, with its elaborately decorated roof, its sculptural enrichments, &c.



CHURCH OF ST. MARY MAGDALENE, TAUNTON.

The whole of the expense connected with this undertaking is likely to exceed £7000, upwards of £4000 of which had to be provided on the responsibility of the Vicar alone. This sum is much larger than was at first contemplated; and we regret to learn that there is still a large deficiency to be provided for. "I hope, however," says the worthy Vicar, "that my friends, and those of the Church, will not be weary in well doing, but they will aid, by their exertions and contributions, the advancement of that day—which will be the happiest one of my life—when the church of St. Mary Magdalene shall be completely finished, and the church account balanced." We trust this consummation is not far distant.

In aid of the Restoration Fund, the Rev. Dr. Cottle has published a very handsome volume of Brief Notices of the History and Restoration of St. Mary's. It is carefully drawn up, and beautifully printed, and embellished: one of its illustrations we have transferred to our columns.

THE WINFARTHING OAK.

This gigantic relic of the sylvan glories of the "olden time," stands on the estate of the Right Hon. the Earl of Albemarle, about four miles from his seat at Quidenham Hall, Winfarthing, near Diss, Norfolk; in the midst of what was formerly "Winfarthing Great Park," anciently a Royal demesne, belonging to the adjacent Palace of Kenninghall Place, from whence Mary, of unhappy memory, was called to the throne in 1553. It is conjectured that this tree must have been in existence before the Christian Era; and this opinion is strengthened by the fact, that, notwithstanding the obvious ravages of time upon its massive trunk, yet no perceptible alteration has taken place within the last sixty years. The oak was, in 1820, 70 feet in circumference at the extremity of the roots; in the middle, 40 feet. The trunk is completely hollow, the "heart" being entirely decayed, and the inside presenting a singular appearance, resembling the old rugged masonry befitting a Druidical temple. It is fitted up inside with seats, a table, &c. Over the doorway entrance is placed, by the late Mr. Doggett, many years the CHARLET.

The death of a great artist is a loss to the world at large, for art disclaims the narrow distinctions of race and country. Such a loss the world has just sustained in the death of Charlet, one of the most popular names in the history of modern painting. The subjects in which he delighted, the style he created, and the form in which the bulk of his works were published, all tended to gain him that popularity. He was in art what Beranger is in poetry; he appealed to the most homely and cherished feelings of the mass of the people with intimitable spirit and fidelity. Some of Beranger's finest songs touch those chords in the hearts of the French people that will never cease to vibrate with the memory of Napoleon, his military triumphs, and the share the people had in them. So with Charlet, his sketches of military life in all its varieties are truth itself; his "Grenadier of the 'Old Guard,'" the beau grognard of Napoleon, is a type, a perfect creation; in every vicissitude of war, in all the inactivity of the garrison, there he is, brave when the occasion calls him, but ever and always grumbling. Charlet was the modern Callot, and his works will hereafter rank even above those of that celebrated engraver, for he possessed a finer spirit of observation, and his style is more graceful, with greater simplicity and breadth. In his countless sketches of the warlike period between the rise and fall of Napoleon, the era lives again; Imperial reviews, marches, encampments, bivouacs, skirmishes, ambuscades, battles themselves: all are there; every variety of military life he has drawn; every kind of uniform and rank, from the Marshal to the drum-major and the corporal; and not their exterior and material form only; their spirit, the life in which they moved and breathed, he caught and fixed with a truthfulness never to be mistaken. Next to the "Grenadier of the Guard," his favourite subject was the "Conscript," new to the ranks and to the trials and vexes of the life thereof, in which his simplicity sorely suffers, till by time and experience made as wise and wicked as the rest. In the scenes in which the Conscript plays a part, Charlet had full scope for his fine vein of humour, and he did not fail to improve it. But he by no means confined his pencil to military subjects. He was the painter of the people; and no rank, and scarcely a calling, escaped his keen eye. The workman, the denizen of the Faubourg, the gamin of Paris, market-women, the concierge, even the thief—all may be found in the sketches he poured forth with exhaustless fertility. But his talent had also its graceful side, frequently exhibited in his drawings of children, in which he touches off their little quarrels, their sports, and their school sufferings, to the life. Even here his popular predilections are visible: the children of the people, not of the rich or the bourgeoisie, were his preference; but his favourite was the child of the regiment. The graces of wealth or rank never purchased his pencil.

Charlet was of obscure parentage; and early in life was placed in a subordinate department of the office of a provincial municipality. One of his duties was to sign the documents of invalided and wounded soldiers; their characteristic figures and faces struck him, and he was in the habit of sketching them in pen and ink, and that with a truth to life and expression, that constituted him a great artist, without his being aware of it.

They were at last seen by some one who could appreciate, them in consequence Charlet quitted his employment, and devoted himself wholly to the profession in which he attained such eminence. At this time, lithography was beginning to be practised in France, and to Charlet art is indebted for developing its capability of producing effect. The bulk of Charlet's sketches were published in lithography, many of them with a phrase or scrap of dialogue, illustrated by the figures. Some of these phrases have almost passed into proverbs The number of his drawings so published amount at least to twelve hundred. For some time Charlet studied under Gros, the painter, and, at a later period of his life began painting in oil; but his pictures in this style are rare compared with his sketches. Those who remember his painting of the "Retreat from Moscow," exhibited some years since, and have visited his atelier, rich with magnificent sketches, will regret that he did not more frequently engage in works of this higher style. Considering the large number of his lithographic sketches, his paintings, his designs and water-colour drawings, his industry and application must have been immense. His personal appearance was thus described some years ago:—"His physiognomy is every where angular; it is a collection of lines of bronze, drawn hard and straight from the bold, square brow, to the point of the grey beard, cut to a sharp angle also. I should not forget the long black great coat, buttoned over a slender figure, from the sleeve of which appeared one of the driest, thinnest, and longest hands that has ever waved from a garment since that of Pantalini." His habits were rather those of the old campaigner than of the student; his favourite place of resort was the cabaret, where his could meet and study those classes of the people he loved to draw. Here the short pipe and the bottle of vin ordinaire were his recreation and solace after his labours, and he would converse with some old soldier of his battles, catching every expression of the war-worn countenance. It is said that many of this class associated with him for years, quite unconscious that their friend was the great artist who was delighting Paris with the graphic sketches so collected. In fact, from frequent contact with, and constant study of military habits and bearing, he had acquired them himself to a remarkable extent. He was often mistaken for a retired officer of the Guards, though he never had been in the army at all. At the period of his death he was fifty-three years of age. Jules Janin has devoted an entire feuilleton of the Débats to a dissertation on the artist and his works. A complete collection of them it would now be almost impossible to make; but the house of Gihaut, brothers, is about to publish a selection of his best sketches, to the number of seven or eight hundred, to appear in eight volumes.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 17, 1846.

When the Kings of Europe were trembling on their thrones before the power of Napoleon, who, however, was then drawing towards the decline of his greatness when they were making together a "holy alliance" against the progress of free opinions—they still, though most reluctant, found it necessary to gain the support of the people. In the hour of danger, Monarchs find how weak they really are without the attachment of those they rule, and never was that weakness more keenly felt than by the King of Prussia in the last years of the great continental struggle. His armies had been scattered like dust, though trained in all the discipline of the Great Frederick, for a greater than Frederick had come against them; his capital had been taken, his country seized, he himself personally humiliated. In the midst of such difficulties, where could he turn for support? The drilled machine, the army, had done its utmost, and been defeated; the only resource left was to arouse the spirit of a people, and enlist the fervour of a whole nation on the side of Monarchy. The insolence of the conquerors and the national antipathy of the Germans to the French had done much to dispose the popular mind for an outbreak, but something more was still wanted. The Crown was lying in the dust, but the experience of the past exercise of its power was not precisely such as to make a people enthusiastic in its rescue; so Royalty made a bargain with the nation, the conditions of which were these—the people were to reconquer the Crown for the King, and the King was to reward the effort by granting a Constitution. It was a direct, formal, and solemn promise, and was accepted on the faith of a Royal word. The nation rose on the invader, others took courage from the general display of enthusiasm, France was exhausted and weary of a war that had drained her of her sons for a whole generation, Germany was exasperated and determined on revenge, and thus Napoleon fell. The King of Prussia breathed once more, ascended his throne, and forgot all the promises he had made to the people in the day of adversity. This breach of faith has continued to rankle in the public mind of Prussia from that day to the present time. The promise was made in 1813; in the year 1846 it remains still unredeemed.

The engagement was made by the late King: on the accession of his present Majesty great hopes were entertained, from his supposed liberal tendencies, that he would carry it into effect; but, as time has worn on, the prospect of his so doing has become more remote than ever; the Diet of the United Provinces has rendered to petition the Crown for performance of its promise in this particular, and for other changes and reforms which are thought necessary. This request has elicited a reply from the King, which is one of the most extraordinary documents ever issued by the head of a State. The form in which it has appeared in the English journals being a mere abstract of the original, gives the pith and meaning of the answers to the several requisitions, and they therefore have an air of abruptness and rude denial, which we are bound to say the document itself does not possess. There the refusals are conveyed in a mass of verbiage, are wrapped up in long and intricate circumlocutions, which render them anything but curt and abrupt. But, in substance, they amount to the same thing; every request is refused without exception, though some of them are so moderate and so plainly advisable as regulations of common utility, that it is almost impossible to conceive any Government possessed of reasoning powers which would not hasten to establish them, even were they not asked for much more when by doing so it might gain great popularity by the concession. But it seems a principle with all continental Governments that the people must be treated like children who do not know what their own interest is; that all they ask for must be mischievous; or, if not mischievous, even if evidently a wise and politic thing to be done, yet the mere fact of the people having requested it, turns it into an evil, and, as a matter of course, it must be refused. The irritation that such a policy, or rather impolicy, must cause, when continually repeated, cannot be described. That discontent is hastening a crisis in Germany, and this State document will not do much to retard it. One great desire of the German people is for publicity of municipal, legal, and legislative proceedings; but the rulers shrink with terror from granting it, as the rivalld, in his close chamber, trembles at the admission of every breath of wholesome air. In every case the prayer is refused; the people of a town must not be admitted to the discussions of their Council—the Courts of Law enquire and decide in secret, and the debates of the Diet—poor and meagre as they are, are confined to the measures submitted to it by the Crown—must not be openly conducted. Some remote prospect is held out, however (and this is the only point to which the fatal formula of refusal is not applied), that these debates may hereafter be published; but how? What would our leviathans of the daily press, who by daybreak publish in full all the debates of both Houses, though prolonged far beyond midnight, say to such a regulation as the following? The reporters are all to be sworn, their pencils are to act under oath; next, a member of the Diet is to be appointed to supervise what they write; and censor after censor, even to the servants of the State, it may be imagined what treatment the speeches of the "Opposition" will receive. Through this machinery the debates will be given to the journals, and there is a prohibition pronounced against the documents so furnished being used by any parties except the conductors of those journals—already under a strict censorship with respect to all they write! Thus the plan adopted in England is exactly reversed. Here the reporters are under no control save that of their respective establishments; the competition of the journals with each other ensures a strict fidelity; and neither Minister nor Opposition Leader, however keen his attack, and however much opposed to him a particular paper may be, ever has any cause of complaint. The practice, which is common enough in France, of garbling the speech of a political opponent, is here wholly unknown; and, as far as fidelity is concerned, it is immaterial what party journal the debates are read from. Such will never be the case where the writers are the sworn servants of the Crown, subjected to a supervision they cannot control. It is not such publicity as this the Germans want. They wish for the reality, and are put off with a sham. They want the truth, and are presented with falsehood. This is not wisdom, but cunning. Not so are states governed; the new regulation will be a constant source of ill-will and heart-burning. The Opposition deputy, with his eloquence suppressed—the Free-Trade member, with his harangue deprived of all significance, and reduced to vapidity by the pen of a Government censor—will always complain, and feed continually that suspicion and distrust already so prevalent. Far better to have wholly refused this demand, as well as all the rest, than have granted it in such a manner.

VISCOUNT CANNING has resigned the office of Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and we are enabled to confirm the rumour that he will be succeeded in that office by the Hon. G. A. F. Smythe, the Member for Canterbury. The acceptance of this appointment of course vacates the seat, so that there must be a new election for that city. We believe that Viscount Canning will succeed Lord Howard de Walden as Ambassador at Lisbon. It is stated, on good authority, that Lord Cathcart will succeed Lord Metcalfe as Governor of Canada,—the civil and military authority being thus placed in the same hands.

DEATH OF MRS. CORNWELL BARON WILSON. This popular writer expired on Monday, at her residence in Woburn-place, leaving a family and a numerous circle of friends to lament her loss. Mrs. W. son was the authoress of several very clever poems. In 1837, she gained the prize offered by the Melodists' Club, for the words of a song, although there were upwards of two hundred candidates. She also was awarded the prize for a poem on the Princess Victoria (now our Most Gracious Queen), at the Cardiff Eistedd fa in 1834; and she also wrote the words in the third volume of Mr Parry's "Welsh Melodies."

SUDDEN DEATH OF MR. ISAAC COHEN. The sudden death of Mr. Isaac Cohen, the brother of Mrs. Rothschild, long a leading and highly-respectable member of the Stock Exchange, has produced a considerable sensation amongst the elder class of his associates, and universal regret amongst the Hebrews. Mr. Cohen is supposed to have died worth about half a million sterling, and, for many years past, he made it a rule to distribute 25 per cent. of his current annual expenditure in unostentatious charity. Mr. Cohen had also often rendered himself conspicuous for assisting unfortunate members of the Stock Exchange, when their conduct merited such support; and many individuals owe their success in life to the interest he took in their welfare Mr Cohen sat down to dinner with his family on Sunday, in apparent good health, when he was suddenly seized with an apoplectic fit, and survived only a few hours.

POSTSCRIPT.

LORD METCALFE.—We regret to learn that the noble Lord is not improving in health, and, what is more distressing to his friends, there is not the slightest hopes that he will recover from the disease his disorder has already made, and daily progressing, in defiance of the most eminent medical skill. There was a consultation a few days since between Sir Benjamin Brodie, Mr. Martin, and several physicians. Although troubled by the greatest pain, the noble Lord possesses a surprising flow of spirits. An address was on Thursday voted to the noble Lord by a meeting of merchants and other gentlemen, held at the rooms of the North American Association, Leadenhall-street.

Sir Hussey's Fine Carpet.—On Thursday the sale by auction of the interior fittings and decorations of this church took place, according to public announcement, "on the premises." The altar-piece, which was in a handsome bold style, and the window two oil paintings, was sold for fifty guineas, and the carved oak pulpit realised fifteen. The greatest competition was for the carved oak poor-box. This box is small, and intrinsically worth nothing, but as a (1683) was discovered wrought in the lock, it acquired a supposititious value, and was bought at four guineas. One of the pews, having a carved oak screen, was sold for £4 6s. This church, which will soon be known to improve the approaches to the Royal Exchange, is of ancient foundation, and, although latterly only a curacy, was formerly a rectory, John de Bukenfee having been rector in the beginning of the fourteenth century. The old church being destroyed in the Great Fire of 1666, the present edifice was built by Sir Christopher Wren in its stead, in 1673

"The good faith with which the Government has continued to discharge its liabilities, both at home and abroad, is producing the most satisfactory consequences, in all that has reference to the re-establishment and consolidation of public credit.

"By the Budget for the approaching economical year, with which you will be presented, in conformity with the fundamental law of the Monarchy, you will learn what are the charges and obligations of the State in the said year, and the means and resources from which the payment must be liquidated

"I feel assured you will lend the most serious attention to the examination of the estimates, and the projects of law by which they will be accompanied, to the end that the Government may be empowered to proceed in the faithful discharge of the duties which are imposed on it in this most important department of the public administration

"In determining the sea and land forces, you will keep in view what the public safety and the dignity of the nation require

"Regarding the various branches of public service which call for legislative measures, Ministers will lay before you such proposals as may be deemed fitting, and experience recommend.

"I confide in the Chambers affording to my Government that efficacious and enlightened co-operation, without which it is impossible to reap the advantages of a representative Government.

"The session is opened."

At half-past one o'clock the ceremony was concluded, and the assembly dispersed

ALGERIA. The Paris Moniteur of Wednesday publishes two despatches from Marshal Bugeaud, one dated the 24th ult., and the other the 26th. In the first he gives an account of the affair between General Bussaud and Abd-el-Kader, but it differs in no respect from that which appears in another part of our paper. In the second he enters upon a lengthened explanation of the causes which led, to a want of cavalry to follow up the affair, and mentions in particular that the unexpected twistings of Abd-el-Kader have rendered it necessary for him to scatter his cavalry in so many points that he has hitherto been unable to concentrate a large force on any one point. He boasts, however, that if he has not been able to bring Abd-el-Kader to more than one battle, he has at least prevented him from penetrating into the province of Algiers. This is the most favourable, even supposing it to be founded in fact, but if we are to believe an Algiers journal of the 31st ult., the France Algérienne—a paper which has always attempted to give the best colour to affairs, and which has indeed since about a year ago under the immediate influence and protection of the Marshal Abd-el-Kader has approached, since his début on the 23rd, to the very walls of Milianah, and pillaged and burned the settlements of the tribes who had made their peace with the French. The details given in a letter from Milianah of the 30th, have little doubt of the truth, of this statement; for the writer says, that the fires were to be seen from that place, and that the tribes had fled in the direction of French camp for protection. This Abd-el-Kader has had rather a victory than a defeat.

THE RAILWAY PROGRESS.

THE BROAD GAUGE.

On Saturday the last of the experiments for testing the attractive powers of the broad-gauge engines, with heavy goods trains, was made under the superintendence of the commission. The weight of the train was 200 tons, exclusive of the engine and tender. The locomotive employed was the Hercules, a six-wheeled passenger engine, with five feet wheels. The train performed the journey from the first mile-post out of Paddington to the 62nd mile-post, in 2h. 24m. 13s., and deducting 29m. 94s. lost in stoppages, the actual running time was 1h. 54m. 7s., which gives an average speed of nearly 37 miles per hour. Taking a working parallel with that upon the great North of England mail-train, viz., over 43 miles out of Paddington, the time occupied was 2h. 32m 41s. Deducting 28m. 8s. for stoppages, the journey was performed in 1h. 57m. 12s., at the rate of 36¾ miles per hour This shows a speed of 7¼ miles per hour over that attained by the narrow gauge engine, or a gain of 12 miles in 43. The maximum speed reached by the narrow gauge engine with the 200 tons was nearly 40 miles per hour, and that attained by the broad gauge engine upwards of 39 per hour. The 400 tons train left the station at 1h. 29m. 48s., and the average speed of the train was about 33 miles per hour, a rate of about four miles greater than the working of the narrow gauge engine. There was very little difference in the maximum speed of the engines. The narrow gauge reached 39, and the broad gauge engine but a little more than 39¾ miles per hour.

EXTRAORDINARY RAILWAY BUBBLES.—It appears from a list in the Times of the Railway Companies provisionally registered, 1263 in number (exclusive of old lines), that 879 of such companies failed to deposit their plans on the 31st of December last, and are therefore unable to proceed with their bills this session

THE AGRICULTURAL PROTECTION SOCIETY.—A special and numerous meeting of this society was held at Willis's Rooms, on Wednesday, the 14th instant, in the chair. The Chairman, in opening the business of the meeting, said, he feared that the great principle of protection was now to be departed from, but why that principle was to be abandoned no one was present could answer some people thought, but that was a considerable time ago, that the panic respecting famine might not have been without its influence in exciting the fears and warping the judgment of her Majesty's Ministers; but recent events had proved that all the fears respecting famine were utterly without foundation, and yet, though nothing could be more baseless than such a ground for attacking the Corn-laws, the agricultural interest was to be sacrificed; and sacrificed, he would ask, to what?—to the money of the Anti-Corn-law League. The gentlemen of the League told the Government and the Legislature, "Give us just this much, and we shall be satisfied: let us only be permitted to ruin you in this small and limited extent, and with that small amount of good fortune, we shall be, and for ever remain, perfectly satisfied." He would ask any Englishman with any pretension to common sense, and with the least imaginable amount of politics, experience, whether there was a shadow of probability that the gentlemen of the League would stop suddenly short after having thus taken the first step in their progress? When was it ever known that success among politicians produced moderation? (Loud cheers.) The gentlemen of the League began by assailing the Corn-laws; their next step, of course, would be to assail every species of protection, and to establish free trade in the most unlimited sense of the word, the ultimate object being to create a demand for cheap ascendancy in every part of England. Speeches were made by Lord Beaumont and Mr. Christopher, M.P., and resolutions in favour of protection to agriculture were passed. It was then proposed that the Society should adopt the same system as the League, and purchase freeholds. For this purpose a resolution was proposed in these terms: "That the following words be expunged from the fourth rule of the society, viz: 'And that no party shall on no account interfere in any election for a member to serve in Parliament.'" The resolution was agreed to. The utmost enthusiasm in favour of protection was exhibited, and the meeting generally expressed a determination to maintain it

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

ANOTHER MURDER AT JERSEY.

Another dreadful murder was perpetrated at Seward's café, Royal-square, Jersey, on Friday morning (last week), at a quarter past two. The victim of this fearful deed is Mr. Abraham, optician, known for many years in the Channel Islands, where he visited occasionally in the course of Thursday night. Mr. Nicolle, butler, of King-street, visited Mr. Seward's café, and shortly after a dispute arose between them respecting two bottles of wine, charged to Mr. N., but which he refused to pay, saying they had been ordered by Mr. Seward, and challenged to fight him then in the square; but Mr. Seward returned and joined the company in doors, which consisted of Mr. Jeffery, Mr. Bowdrige, jun., Mr. C. Du Pont, and Miss Cook, Mr. Seward's housekeeper.

Only a few minutes had elapsed when a report of fire-arms was heard, the contents of which had entered the café, and in another moment its effect was visible by the almost instant death of Mr. Abraham, he having been struck in the back by three pistol bullets, one of which passed through his body, coming out about the centre of his breast. Miss Cook, who stood near the table, was shot through the left hand and hip, the ball having previously passed between Mr. Seward, and Abraham's breast and Mr Bowdidge's hand (fortunately the young lady's life is not considered in danger). Mr. Seward and Mr. Bowdidge, on hearing the report, instantly ran out as far as Nicolle's house, when they heard a door slam; they then tried the door, but found it fastened on the inside

Next morning, a watchman entered Mr. Nicolle's room, and found him with his child in his arms; he immediately surrendered himself into the hands of the police.

The deceased was formerly in the employment of Messrs. Dollond, of London, and has for a number of years carried on the business of a shoemaker at Brentford, and near the residence of the Duke of Cumberland, but some months since, in consequence of failing in his circumstances, he made his business over to his son, who is in his thirtieth year. His affairs, in the course of time, being arranged, he returned home to again resume his business, but he was there met by a rebuff from his son, who told him that he was no longer his house, and that he must find his father out of doors. He had since, by the aid of those who had known him in his more prosperous days, managed to subsist; but, every means being exhausted, he came to the resolution of making one more effort to regain his own, or at least to obtain a shelter under the roof where he knew he was entitled to be. For that purpose he on Tuesday forenoon repaired thither, but his son refusing to listen to his appeal, he in a moment of excitement caught a knife which lay on the table and stabbed his son in the breast, who immediately fell, and the father then drew the same knife across his own throat, inflicting a frightful wound. The dying words which had previously stood, having attracted the attention of the house, an alarm was instantly given. A surgeon was sent for, who pronounced the son to have received an injury in one of the vital organs, which would no doubt prove fatal; and having placed him in a bed and attended to him, severed Mr. Peck in the throat of the latter, who was subsequently removed to the hospital. The old man, on being questioned, said he had better die as he had meditated than be starved. He is not expected to survive.

FIRE IN THE STRAND.—On Sunday morning, between the hours of three and four, a fire broke out in the Castle Tavern, Bull Inn court, Strand, the property of Mr. Thomas Parker, licensed victualler. The premises, which were three stories high, were flanked on either side by numerous dwelling-houses, and were adjoined at the rear by the Adelphi Theatre. An alarm having been raised, a considerable period elapsed before the proprietor and the different inmates could be aroused, by which time the whole of the back of the building, composed principally of timber, was completely wrapped in flames. With such impetuosity was the fire seen burning, that it was with the greatest difficulty that any one could effect a safe retreat. The waiter, a man named James Craner, together with [illegible], were obliged to leap from one of the upper windows into the court. The [illegible] jumping out of the window, started off in the street for the fire [illegible] Chandos-street Bridnde Station, to give intelligence. When the engines arrived the flames had broken through the roof There being only a lath-and-plaster partition between the burning premises and the house No 7 in the occupation of [illegible], a few seconds only elapsed before the latter also became ignited. For some time it was feared that the Adelphi Theatre would have been consumed, the sky [illegible] the roof being reflected many times in flames. A number of fire-engines, however, having mounted the roof, a quantity of water, kept there in a tank provided in case of such a disaster, was scattered about, and by that means the theatre was preserved. After about the same time, the firemen at length succeeded completely in extinguishing the fire. The damage done is very considerable; the whole of the stock belonging to Mr. Parker, together with his furniture and wearing apparel, is totally lost. The only parts out of the great number of [illegible] which remained were Mr. Parker; eight or nine families are therefore deprived of [illegible] thing they once possessed

THE LATE ACCIDENT ON THE NORFOLK RAILWAY.—The Coroner's investigation respecting the death of William Pickering, engine-driver, and Richard Hedger, stoker, who were killed by the recent accident on the Norfolk Railway was resumed on Thursday morning, the fourth time, at the Bell Inn, Stratford. Major-General Pasley was examined at considerable length upon scientific points connected with railway travelling. The General attributed the cause of this accident to the engine-driver proceeding at an imprudent and excessive speed on a descending gradient. When all the evidence was concluded, the Jury, after being some time in consultation, sent for the Coroner, when the Foreman informed him that they had not unanimously arrived at a verdict, and he feared there would Little hopes of their agreeing.—The Coroner then inquired how many of the Jury were unanimous? The Foreman answered, twelve.—The Coroner said, if the twelve Jurymen were unanimous, he would receive their verdict; and asked the Foreman what was their return? The Foreman observed that their verdict was "Accidental Death, caused by the imprudent conduct of the engine-driver, in going at an excessive speed." The dissenting Jury (three in number) remarked that the verdict they were desirous of agreeing to was accidental death, caused by the misconduct of the engine-driver, and the defective construction of the engine, and left the decision of £500 on the engine.—The Coroner accordingly took the verdict of the twelve

ATTEMPT TO BURN FOUR HOUSES IN CAMDEN TOWN.—On Tuesday night, shortly after o'clock, a unanimous outbreak of no fewer than four separate fires took place in Camden-town, which there is every ground to conclude was the work of an incendiary. It appears that three police-constables of the S division were passing their rounds past Rowley-fields, Camden-town, when one of them had his attention directed towards the western corner house of a pair of four newly-erected habitations situate in the fields, by perceiving an unusual light there. At first the officer imagined that the light was caused by some of the workmen driving the building; but, as it increased in strength, he hastened across the fields to examine the place, when he found smoke pouring forth from the roof and windows, which at once satisfied him that the house was on fire. Without delay an alarm was raised, and the officer being quickly joined by other constables, an attempt was at once made to extinguish the flames, by procuring buckets of water upon them. Whilst the constables, however, were engaged in these three houses, they discovered that the other corner house was also on fire at the back, and in the course of a few seconds afterwards the found out that the remaining two houses were likewise in flame A messenger was [illegible] dispatched in a cab for the engines. The firemen upon arriving had to encounter great difficulties to get an engine near the burning houses They having passed off fire-hydrant at hand, a line was formed by the men, and by passing the water from one to the other a stream was discharged into the buildings which had the desired effect of getting the flames extinguished. That, however, was not accomplished until the fire had travelled throughout the first named house, and had nearly burned the remaining three, more especially the staircases and parlour floorings From the fact of the four houses being on fire at the same time, not the least doubt remains but the fire was wilfully caused.

SUICIDE BY A CHANCERY SUITOR. On Wednesday evening Mr Wakley held an inquest at the Robin Hood, Richmond, upon the body of Mr. James Ede, aged fifty-three, late an extensive miller at Byfleet, Surrey, and for the last thirty years a suitor in the Court of Chancery for pr perty said to be to the amount of [illegible]. The Jury viewed the body which presented a most appalling spectacle, the throat being cut twelve inches across the windpipe bone. Mary Wheatley, chambermaid at the Robin Hood, stated that about nine o'clock on Tuesday morning deceased rang for his clean linen. She answered his bell, and told him he was not ready. A few minutes after she heard him call him She had scarcely got down stairs when she was recalled by the officer, who said, "Go in, I think the man has cut his throat." She went in, and saw deceased with both hands working at his throat. A large quantity of blood issued from the wound against the wall.— Mr. William Ede, eldest son of deceased, said his father had been a Chancery suitor for a large amount of property, which greatly affected his mind, and deprived his of sleep. He was exceedingly nervous. He never let his friends know the exact state of his circumstances. Mr. Willis sheriff's officer, arrested deceased about ten o'clock on Tuesday morning, under an execution issued by Mr. Thorpe, proprietor of the Robin Hood, for £160. When he told deceased under what circumstances he arrested him, deceased replied, "Impossible; I gave him a judgment, but never thought he would take such steps. It was foolish for him to do so, as he was certain of his money, for an estate would be soon sold which would realise £30,000, that would be divided amongst five creditors." He then desired witness to call Mr. Thorpe, and witness was so doing, when, hearing a noise, he turned round, and, seeing that deceased had cut his throat, called for assistance. Mr. Thorpe stated that he issued the execution at the desire of deceased, in the hope that it would induce the solicitors in the case to pay his demand. Verdict, "Insanity."

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

PRESENTATION OF THE FREEDOM OF THE CITY OF GLASGOW TO LORD JOHN RUSSELL.

The ceremony of presenting Lord John Russell with the Freedom of the City, took place on Monday, in the City Hall, Glasgow. The doors were opened at one o'clock, and by two, the time when the proceedings commenced, the hall was [illegible] by a most respectable audience On the entrance of the Noble Lord, who was preceded by the Lord Provost, the company stood up, and cheered long and enthusiastically the ladies waving their handkerchiefs, and the gentlemen their hats On the platform were, the Right Hon. the Lord Provost and Lord of Russell, [illegible]r, the Earl of Camperdown, Lord Belhaven, Sir Thomas Dick [illegible] Leader, jun., of Grange; A. Rutherford, Esq., M.P.; the Hon. Fox [illegible] the Hon. Norman Dalby, of Carnbee, &c. &c.

An appropriate address from the Lord Provost, in presenting the Freedom, Lord John Russell, in returning thanks, adverted to the leading incidents of his [illegible] and said—It was my earnest wish to be present on this occasion, as well as to those past, that the expression of the public voice, acting upon the Constitution of England, would gain all that was to be desired." (Loud cheers.)

He then alluded to Ireland, in these terms:—"My opinion is, that Scotchmen should have the same privileges as Englishmen, and that Irishmen ought to have the same privileges as both Scotchmen and Englishmen. (Cheers.) I consider that the union was a permanent and unalterable institution, if Ireland is not to be treated, in the hour of difficulty and distress, as an integral part of the United Kingdom, and unless we are prepared to say that we are ready to grant to Irishmen a participation in all our rights and privileges, or to treat them exactly as if they were the inhabitants of the same island. (Great applause.) I, therefore, could never listen to, or agree with the assertion that they ought to be considered as aliens. (Cheers.) Nor could I consent to any move, or to the absence of any law, which were founded on this unjust presumption. (Renewed applause.) And yet the endeavour to obtain those privileges with respect to the corporations, for instance—as to Irishmen the simple power to govern their own local affairs—even this privilege we were defeated, session after session, in endeavouring to enforce. But I am happy to say that, at this time of day, the principle appears to be generally conceded, and the dispute only upon the time, or how it can be properly carried into effect. For myself, I think [illegible] both in peace and in war." (Cheers).

Lord John Russell next referred to the question of Commercial Reform, and the proposal made by his Government in 1841. "You all know that part of this proposition was, that there should be an alteration of foreign sugar, with a differential duty of 12s. (Hear.) It was another part of that scheme that the duties on corn, instead of proceeding on what is called the sliding scale, should be regulated according to the uniform fixed duty of 8s. per quarter—and fixed duty only to be suspended by an Order in Council, of which suspension her Majesty's advisers were to be judges. Now, in consequence of that proposition, the Government of the day were assailed as the most violent enemies of the agricultural interest. It was held up as an enemy of the farmers and agriculturists of the United Kingdom; they rejected my proposition, and it was prevented being carried in Parliament. The friends of protection, as I understood them, said many and truly thought they had obtained a triumph. Do they now rejoice that that 8s. duty was rejected? (Laughter and cheers.) Are they now prepared to say that the 8s. duty, which would have prevented many of the severe and mitigated many the evils which occurred to the manufacturing towns in the years 1841, 1842 and 1843, would not have been a compromise most favourable to the views of those who are opposed to protection? (Loud cheering.) I was represented as an enemy of the landed interest and to the farmer. Upon my word, upon reflection on my conduct, I only doubt that it, whether that duty having been rejected, peremptorily, with every mark of scorn and contumely, I ought not to [illegible] I will make no further proposition of the kind. (Hear, hear.) Is there any man who, as a Minister in Parliament—as the Minister of his Sovereign—would propose terms equally favourable as those which I proposed in 1841? I believe not (laughter and cheers); and, for my part, when I saw those obstructions, and those continued rejections, I reflected that that continued proposition of mine, which was not accepted by the landed interest, was really an obstacle in the way of those who asked for the complete freedom of trade on the shelves of the Corn-laws; and, rather than be an obstacle in the way, and believing that the present Corn-laws are, as I have stated, injurious to agriculture, as well as to commerce, I withdrew that proposition, and declared my opinion in a letter to the electors of the City of London, whom I have the honour to represent, that those Corn-laws ought to be repealed. (Loud and continued cheering.) Gentlemen, it does not become me, in this place, to refer to occurrences of which you must all be aware, and of which the day of explanation will arrive as to the circumstances which led to the resignation of the Ministry, and the [illegible] [illegible]

LAUNCH OF THE "AMPHION" SCREW FRIGATE, AT WOOLWICH DOCKYARD, ON WEDNESDAY LAST.

Miss Psyche Hoste, daughter of the late Captain Sir William Hoste, was to have named the Amphion, but in consequence of that young lady's indisposition, the interesting ceremony was performed by Miss Rawlins, niece of Admiral Sir James Hawkins Whitshed, Bart, G.C.B., Admiral of the Fleet.

The Amphion was ordered to be built on the 16th of May, 1828, and to be named the Ambuscade, but from some well-grounded objection to that name, it was altered to Amphion, by an Admiralty order of the 31st of March, 1831. The building of the vessel commenced on the 18th of April, 1830, from the designs of Sir Robert Seppings; and was carried on on the same lines as the Castor frigate, but she has since been lengthened sixteen feet by the bow, and fitted in the stern for a screw propeller as an auxiliary, every other part and filling being the same as a proper sailing frigate. She appears to be a sightly vessel, and sits well upon the water. Her figure head is a bust of the late gallant Captain Sir William Hoste, Bart., and her stern is of a neat square form externally, but round internally, for fighting her guns, and to all appearance will be a fast sailer, and a good ship of war.

The following are her dimensions:—

	Feet	Inches
Length of the lower deck	177	0
Length of the keel for tonnage	152	1⅝
Breadth extreme	43	2
Breadth for tonnage	43	8
Breadth moulded	13	4½
Burthen in tons, old measure, 1,473	66-94
Do. do. new .. 973	141-3,500

The Amphion is to be taken, on Monday next, to the East India Docks, to be fitted with engines of 300-horse power, by Messrs. Miller and Ravensforth, and will be the first constructed for the steam navy of this country, with the whole of her machinery considerably under the water line, and, consequently, not liable to be deranged by shot during warfare. The screw will be fifteen feet in diameter, on Ericsson's principle, attached to engines on the direct-principle, invented by Count de Rosen, with four feet stroke, performing forty-eight revolutions per minute. The boilers will also be under the water line, and the vessel is expected to be a superior ship of war, by the aid of these appliances.

In addition to the authorities of the Dockyard, and several naval and military officers, there were present at the Launch, the Danish Ambassador; Lieutenant-Colonel Dundas, C.B.; Colonel Chalmer, Major Elgee, Royal Artillery; Colonel Nichols, Major Bright, Royal Marines; and Commander Smith, Royal Navy.

ALGERIA.

The following important intelligence is from the Sémaphore de Marseilles of the 10th inst., bringing news from Algiers of the 7th. The Correspondent of that Journal writes, that on the 22d ult. the cavalry of Marshal Bugeaud had gained a brilliant victory over the regulars of Abd-el-Kader, commanded by the Emir in person. The Marshal having been informed that Abd-el-Kader was encamped to the north of the mountain of Ben Chetoute, made the necessary preparations to attack him. On the 22d, at nightfall, the whole cavalry under the orders of General Jussuf was directed to march forward, whilst the Marshal would take possession, at daybreak, of a defile through which the Emir might attempt to escape before the cavalry. On reaching the valley of the Temda, General Jussuf was soon on the trace of the enemy, who had just raised his camp. The numerous cavalry of the Emir had proceeded in one direction, and his baggage in another. General Jussuf resolved to attack the latter. His squadrons were tired after a long night's march, and could not have overtaken the cavalry. It was, besides, the surest means of obliging the Emir to give battle: for it was not probable that he would suffer his convoy and servants to be captured without even attempting to defend them. A portion of the baggage was already in the hands of the pursuers, when the Emir presented himself on the left, at the head of 700 or 800 regular cavalry, who trotted up in excellent array. General Jussuf immediately charged them, with about 400 chassours, gendarmes, and spahis, who were received with a murderous fire of musketry when they came within fifty yards of the enemy. The latter opposed an obstinate resistance, but were, however, soon put to flight, and rallied at some distance from the field, round the white banner of Abd-el-Kader. The French cavalry again attacked them in that position, and again routed them with considerable loss. During this second engagement the Emir's horse was killed, and his men were seen to gather round him and place him on another horse. The fugitives then took a third position, from which they were driven with the same intrepidity. Abd-el-Kader ultimately retreated, leaving in the hands of the French his killed, wounded, horses, tents, and baggage. The difficult nature of the country, and the great distance which separated him from the Marshal's infantry, did not allow General Jussuf to derive more advantage from his victory.

The annexed Illustration is a scene from the late war in Algeria—an Arab Encampment surprised by French soldiers. The Arabs represented are the Kabyles; the costumes those of the Chiefs; the female has been surprised at her toilet by the French troops. This Engraving is from a highly-finished water-colour drawing by M. F. Goupil, a pupil of Horace Vernet.

THE WAR IN ALGERIA.—FROM A DRAWING BY A PUPIL OF HORACE VERNET

F I N E A R T S.

THE HOLY FAMILY.—PAINTED BY MURILLO.

MURILLO'S HOLY FAMILY (FROM SEVILLE).

(NOW IN THE LOUVRE.)

The Spanish painter clothed his sight with gleams
Of Nature's beauty, and his soul's delight
Soar'd to her skies, and revell'd in her streams;
Wooed her rich green in all its robes of li[ght]
Worshipped the wood-hills and the oli[ve]
Spreading their rural charms out to the sun;
And caught the fervour of the peasants' loves,
Whispered in music where his course was run.

Murillo loved the landscape-life of Spain,
Its feast of sunbeams, and its garb of gold;
Its evening love-trysts, and the thrilling str[ain]
In which the wild and passionate hope was told;
The peasant's rustic lif[e] toil—its g[lee]
Dancing day-gladness—p[ain]
Were sights the painter's vision loved to s[ee]
So, with their truth his spirit-pencil glows.

The rustic cottage and the river mill,
These fall into his pictures like sweet dreams,
Laden with pleasure-images; and still
He truest paints where Nature loveliest seems.
Now comes the beautiful eternal truth,
That Nature draws the heart to Nature's God;
And many a man hath gained his faith, in sooth,
From hills he toil'd o'er, and from vales he trod.

[Ev]en the proud painter passed from love of earth
To heavenly worship, with devotion fair—
Beauty and sunshine filled his land of birth,
And old Religion's fervour lingered there.
He left awhile the landscapes of his love,
To loftier thoughts his genius now was gi[ven]
Far, far he wing'd its fervent flight above,
And strove to paint the portraiture of Heaven.

Now in religious temples shone his fame,
Through works of glory which the priests enshrine;
With pious thoughts was link'd Mur[illo's]
And the world-painter liv'd in thine.
He shines his master-task [is]
Which Sevil[le] worshipped in its sacred halls.
L[ouvre] transferr'd to swell the gorgeous troop
Which Genius summon'd to the Louvre's walls.

And now the wider world may find delight
In this best triumph of Murillo's mind,
Soaring in pious grandeur to its height;
In texture delicate—in thought refined—
Here gives he unto Heaven the homage due,
A lowly offering to th' Eternal Fount,
From which he earliest inspiration drew—
By wood, by stream, by valley, and by mount!

MUSICAL REVIEW.

THERE IS A JOY. Canzonet, composed by G. T. HAYDON. Chappell.

[The] poetry of these words, dedicated to the Hon. Mrs. Norton, by Mr. Frankum, of a better order than is to be found in the generality of modern songs. Mr. Haydon has composed a pleasing and flowing melody, in three sharps, three-four time—the expressive accompaniment to which will be admired.

THE MERRY LITTLE GREY FAT MAN. Eccentric Song, written, composed, and [sung] by T. T. Purday.

[Mr. Purday] ought to hold a much more distinguished position than that of a co[mic] but genius is too often erratic. The frequenters of our public concert [rooms] quainted with the bonhomie qualities of this clever composer, as eccentric as the words of his compositions. His song of the fable of ' [the] Monkey," is perfect in its kind, and always convulses the auditor [with] laughter. "The Little Merry Fat Grey Man" is replete with rollicking [fun] and, as there is a "natural joy [in] Elsewhit would sing it with great gusto, being a laughing philosopher himself.

MUSIC

M. JULLIEN'S CONCERTS.

The Beethoven "Festival" at Covent Garden Theatre, although it has been accompanied with the usual quantum of puffing on the part of M. Jullien, has been gratifying in many respects. The result has proved that the metropolitan audiences are sufficiently advanced in musical knowledge to appreciate the instruments gems set before them. The colossal C minor Symphony occupied the entire first night, leaving out the repeats, nearly half an hour, and yet we noticed that the audiences of Monday and Tuesday listened with breathless attention from be ginning to end; and at the climax of superb chords in this symphonic spectacle it sublimity, the cheering was long continued. As from this time "symphonies," in their entire form, will be no strangers to the multitudes, it may be interesting to the non-scientific lovers of music to know what are the characteristics.

We owe this class of composition to John Charles Stamitz, a celebrated violinist and composer, who was born in Bohemia in 1719, and died in 1761, at Mannheim, being then in the service of the Elector Palatine. He was the son of a schoolmaster, and was almost self-taught—at all events, he had no master of note. "Endowed," says Fétis, "with original genius, he infused into his music more lightness and brilliancy than were found in the works of the German composers of his time. His symphonies preceded those of Haydn, and were probably of some use in the development of the genius of that great man. Stamitz also wrote many sonatas for the violin, which were very good for the time. In his violin music, and particularly in his concertos, he has been compared with Tartini; but if he has less clearness in melodious imagery than the celebrated Italian violinist, he is superior to him in breadth and variety of harmony. His ability, forming a duo for a single violin, proves that he must have been highly skilful in counterpoint."

Stamitz left eleven symphonies, and it was Haydn, who laid down the special forms of this orchestral school, which has so revolutionized instrumental writing. Haydn composed no less than 118 symphonies, which maintained their popularity until Mozart came forth with his dozen. Both these masters bowed with the glorious nine, and, since him, there have been innumerable writers, of whom Spohr and Mendelssohn alone assert a decided supremacy in Germany, and Berlioz in France. A symphony may be varied according to the genius of its writer, but it generally consists of four movements—an allegro, an andante, a scherzo (substituted by Beethoven for Haydn's minuet form), and a finale. We shall not follow the technical track of describing, but to explain that it is in the treatment of a subject that musical artifices are exhausted by the inspired composer melodious ideas, worked into all possible combinations, exhausting what are designated "counterpoint, imitation, fugue, canon, &c." Hitherto, except at the Philharmonic and other great concerts, it has been usual to give only a single movement, under the apprehension that gallery taste might suggest the calling out, as it has sometimes been the case with Shakspeare—of that well known sign of impatience—"Cut it short." Such, however, was not the case at the Beethoven Festival; and, although we have heard the C Minor go better than under M Jullien's excellent direction, precision, skill, and spontaneity of the players, carried them through triumphantly, whenever they trusted solely to themselves. To direct the music of Beethoven is the study of a life, and M. Jullien's exciting influence upon the orchestra, his experience most fatal to his success as a conductor of classical music. Whenever he had a bit of brassing or drumming, he turned round triumphantly to the executants in ecstasy, and, by his exaggerated explains, excited them to a corresponding enthusiasm. In the close of the march it was quite ludicrous the din was awful, and Jullien's baton, "in a fine phrensy rolling," was beating a hundred demi-semiquavers in a bar. Why does he not resign his post, when the great masters appear in his programmes, to Tolbecque, Rousselot, Lucas, or Loder? He would be fresh and vigorous for the "Cricket" Polka, and he all would be then at his feet. How can he exhaust his energies on Beethoven, when he has to gyrate in the Navy Quadrille? Not let us have Jullien for the grand crash, or, as the Yankees have it, "the everlasting smash," but let him not sell his white kids with Beethoven!

Camillo Sivori's engagement has been fortunate. Although a pupil of Paganini, he plays the works of the German school to perfection. He executed on Monday the andante and presto of the celebrated Sonata of Beethoven, dedicated to Kreutzer, for violin and piano, Mr. Hatton taking the latter part with much ability; and on Tuesday, Sivori performed the same andante as arranged by Berlioz, under the title of "Il Tremolo." The performance of Sivori on the 6th night—he was indisposed on the Monday—was magnificent; nothing can be more true than his intonation in the most difficult passages. The overtures of "Egmont" and "Fidelio," the Allegretto of the Eighth symphony in F, a movement of Beethoven's Pianoforte sonata in F scored for full orchestra, the air with variations and scherzo of the famous Septuor, played by twenty-four violins, ten tenors, ten violoncellos, eight contrabassi, and double wood basses, and the waltz "Le Désir," have been included in Monday and Tuesday's scheme. The waltz was encored on both occasions, in compliment to the first and second violins, the tenors, and the violoncelli, and the contrabassi, each set of instruments playing a variation in unison, the effect of which was certainly curious, although these fantastic tricks were not of Beethoven's manufacture.

MR. HORN'S ENTERTAINMENT.

On Thursday evening Mr. C. Horn, the popular composer and vocalist, appeared at the Hanover-square Rooms, in a new entertainment, called "Days and Legends of Normandy." The room was well attended, and the novelty was quite successful, owing, however, more to the excellency of the 12 new compositions which Mr. Horn has given to the world, than to the Stanfield gleamings from guide books, tours, &c. Normandy is rich in legends and superstitions, but the subject was not the best for a musical lecture. We shall never further into the merits of Mr. Horn's really clever music on a future occasion.

The Messrs. Williams were rapturously encored in a delightful duet called "Merrily Trip," and Mr. Hobbs in a charming canzonet, "The Maiden of Normandy," and Mr. Machin in a ballad, "Poor Marie." In the accompaniments on the pianoforte were far superior to his execution, but his Entertainment will, no doubt, be popular, arising from the force of his own talents.

THE ROYAL ALBERT PIANOFORTE AND DE FOLLY'S GEOMETRICAL PIANOFORTE

Having been invited to inspect these new inventions, we require no graphic aid to describe them: indeed, the machinery is so simple in nature that it would present no interesting features for illustration, and the novelties can be easily explained in sober prose. M. De Folly is the clever finisher of her Majesty's Theatre, and his invention consists in an entirely new action of the keys. It is most simple, but most effective, reducing as it does the fingerings on the piano to two. When the scales of C and G are acquired, the performer can play immediately in any other key. As these are mainly, if not entirely, the keys which the great pianists employ, if the composition be too high or too low for the register, the transposing key will bring the hand, and the compass of the transposing power being two semitones lower or higher, the performer is not puzzled. Galland justly observes in his able treatise, is abundantly sufficient for every vocal purpose.

MUSICAL SOCIETIES.

The 106th Anniversary Festival of the Madrigal Society was celebrated on Thursday night, at Freemasons' Hall, which was opened for the first time since it has been renovated and altered. Lord Saltoun was in the chair, and several works of the old masters were sung by a choir of twenty-four voices, to the delight of a numerous audience. We shall give a sketch of the Madrigalists in our next publication, with an account of the society since its formation.

THE WESTERN MADRIGAL SOCIETY.—This Society met on Saturday, for the first time this season, at the rooms of the Royal Society of Musicians. Mr. Spenser was conductor, in the place of Mr. Hawes, who was absent from indisposition. Under the active exertions of Mr. G. Hodd, the Secretary, the Society has, in two years, gained a prominent position, and, in numbers, now exceeds the Madrigalists at the Freemasons'.

THE GLEE CLUB AND THE ABBEY GLEE CLUB. These two Clubs met at the Crown and Anchor Tavern on Saturday evening last, being the [illegible] ing of the season of the former, and the first of the latter, which is directed by Mr. Jose Howe. The "Glee Club" has Mr Lindley for conductor, and Mr King as his colleague. Sir Felix Booth was in the chair. The gems were "Cooke's "Shade of my Heroes," Horsley's "Cold as Cadwallo's Tongue," Webbe's "When winds breathe soft," and Wade's Madrical, "Die not, fond fop."

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY. Mr. Adams will perform on the great organ in Exeter Hall, on Friday next. The selection includes, in addition to Mr [illegible]'s extempore performances, many well-known pieces.

CONCERTS. Miss H Groom gave a concert at Crosby Hall, on Monday; and Mr Robert's annual concert took place on Wednesday at the Music Hall, Store-street. On Monday next is the third meeting of the Choral Harmonists; and on Wednesday following is the first of Madame Dulcken's classical soirées.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—Rumours of the sale of this theatre for the establishment is now actively progressing, and the prospectus of the losses is anxiously anticipated. The engagement of Madame Tadolini, so long the idol of Vienna, is certain. Gabbini has returned to his post, when the great massive opera

CITY ANTIQUITIES.—In excavating for the formation of a sewer opposite the Ship Tavern, in Talbot-court, Gracechurch-street, the workmen, on Monday, came in contact with the remains of a Roman wall, lined with chalk, and firmly cemented. It has been laid open, and visited by a number of antiquarians.

A WOMAN DROWNED IN A CISTERN.—On Sunday afternoon, a woman, named Dancombe, the wife of a cabman living in silver-mews, near Red Lion-square, Holborn, went out to fetch the beer for dinner; but, after a lapse of time, her husband went to seek for her, and he found her in the cistern, which was at the foot of the stairs, and into which she had accidentally fallen. Her husband extricated her, and sent for a surgeon, who pronounced life to be extinct.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"*J. "B. M. P." You are quite right in the game referred to: White may delay the mate a move, by interposing his Queen. We promise ourselves much pleasure in playing over the variations on some of Philidor's games, with which you have favoured us.

"A Subscriber." Forres.—We regret to say we are quite ignorant of the game in question.

"Alcander" It is quite consistent with fair play to win the game in the quickest possible way. If mate can be given in fewer moves by your playing a Pawn to —— a new variate to do so.

"P. ——" The King can castle after having been checked.

"Anchora Spes." Solicitude is a dreary guest.

"O. O.," Oxford.—Your solution is not quite perfect, as you will see by that published in the present Number.

"A Constant Reader."—You can obtain any back Number of this Paper by sending to the office.

"Maran." It appears to us impossible, in Problem 102, to effect mate according to the stipulations, except in the manner you have given. If White, for his first move, takes the K B P, as you suggest, Black will delay the mate to five moves

"J. F. C." Margate.—The position you have sent us a novelty is known to almost every tyro playing upon a Chessboard.

"Pawn," Exeter.—In the position sent, Black might fairly claim a drawn game, we think, if White failed to mate him within fifty moves. Any but a "great incapable" would accomplish the task in eight or nine.

"T. T. W." Derby.—The anniversary dinner of the Liverpool Chess Club is appointed for Wednesday, the 28th of this month.

"Pilot." Your suggestion is happily been realised. The "Chess Player's Chronicle" will, next month, appear under very favourable auspices, and for the future will derive the advantage of arrangements calculated to acquire for it that widely-extended popularity which circumstances canceled with its publication here-tofore presented.

It is not at all difficult, so do not "give it up."

"Marius." We do not answer questions concerning games at cards.

"D. D."—Your solution was only partially correct. This is frequently the case with —— and we shall, in future, close each half-end-half attempts among the failures, for the purpose of ensuring greater carefulness in the examination of our Problems

"Scrutator." The games between Messrs. Kennedy and Williams, in the "Chess Magazine" of last month, are not to be taken as an indication of their relative strength. They are as nearly as possible of the same force.

Solutions by "J. S. P.," "J. Dobbs," "Chapel Rock," "P. E.," "Mars," "Alpha," "W. A. K." Feversham; "R. P." "H. P." and "S. and Co." are correct. These by "R. T.," "H. J." "P. W. P." "A Rugbean," and "C. P.," are all wrong.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—The present week's arrivals of English wheat have been on a very moderate scale, yet, as the dealers generally are aware of the approach of the Parliamentary session, the demand for that article to-day was extremely heavy, at nominally extreme late rates. In foreign but few sales as well as no demand to notice were transacted. Of all other kinds of grain the show was very small, yet, owing to the above-mentioned cause, scarcely any business was transacted.

ARRIVALS: English: wheat, [illegible] barley, [illegible] oats, 3500; Irish: wheat, [illegible] barley, [illegible] oats, ——; Foreign: wheat, 8260; barley, [illegible] oats, 9410 quarters. Flour, 5060 sacks and [illegible] quarters.

PROTECTION SOCIETY'S MEETINGS—WOLVERHAMPTON.

THE MEETING IN THE ASSEMBLY-ROOM, WOLVERHAMPTON.

ing votes. (Hear, hear.) The events of the last month afforded a strong argument in favour of the Corn-laws

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr R. Evans said that the question for their consideration was, how was this protection to be maintained. He thought they were right in taking a leaf out o the book of the Anti-Corn-law League. Not that leaf which prescribed the purchase of votes by corruption and perjury, but the leaf which taught them the necessity of meeting together, and displaying their strength and determination. He could not agree in the remark that their meeting excited alarm. Looking at the meeting that he saw before him, and remembering that not many miles off another meeting was being held in the same county, he did not despair. He could scarcely believe that Sir Robert Peel, the father of the present law, could abandon it. Could he have been intimidated by the letter of Lord John Russell? refusing, as it did, that statesman to the level of a League follower (Hear, hear.) He did not, and would not believe that Sir R. Peel would deprive them of protection—say, not even of the protection they now had—for, with less protection, corn could not be grown by the English farmer. He begged to move that "This meeting records its unalterable determination to support a protection, certainly not less than at present existing, and to resist, by every legal and constitutional means, every attempt at its reduction, in whatever quarter it may originate."

Mr. Hilditch seconded the resolution. He would call upon them to borrow the tactics of the League they must meet combination by combination—meeting by meeting fact by fact—argument by argument. (Cheers.) But, above all, they must meet falsehood by truth. (Loud cheers.) He was no advocate of a class legislation, but he was the advocate of a position which would reward the farmer, and yet give the cheapest food to the consumer. (Cheers.) The English producer could not compete with the foreign grower, and, not being able to compete with him, the one Government must sink into a vile subserviency on the other. America would settle it on Oregon question, and every other dispute in which she was engaged with England, by depriving them of their bread and cheese. (Cheers and laughter.)

Mr. E Wigan moved the following resolution:—"That this meeting hereby declares its readiness to co-operate with the Central Protection Society, and with the Local Protection Societies, in any steps which may be deemed applicable on the present or at any future emergency."

Dr. Mannix begged to second the resolution. The League had great wealth—vast numbers; but they wanted the moral force of truth, and, wanting that, they were an enemy which the agriculturists need not dread. All that was necessary was that they should exert themselves and defeat those enemy of war of which the League so much boasted

Thanks were voted to the Earl of Dartmouth for his conduct in the chair, which his Lordship briefly acknowledged, and the meeting separated.

BRITISH MUSEUM · MODEL OF THE CAR OF JUGGERNAUT.

A Model of the celebrated Car of Juggernaut (Jagganátha), has just been placed in the New Room at the British Museum, popularly known as "the Chinese Room," from the great Chinese Bell being placed near the centre of its floor. The Juggernaut Model is inclosed in a glass case, nearly in a line with the Chinese Bell. The Car Model is somewhat small, but it displays the idolatrous finery of scarlet broad-cloth, numerous flags, &c.

The raths, or Cars, are used at the great festival of the Chariot: they have an imposing air, from their size and loftiness, being about 40 feet high, with solid wheels of six feet diameter; but every part of the ornament is of the most mean and paltry description, save only the covering of striped and spangled broad-cloth, the splendour and gorgeous effect of which make up, in a great measure, for other deficiencies.

MODEL OF THE CAR OF JUGGERNAUT, IN THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

ALTERATION IN THE NAVAL UNIFORM. One of the reported alterations in the naval uniform is with respect to the great-coat. It is to be similar to the late frock-coat, only double-breasted, with buttons on the lappels behind, the material to be of pilot cloth or blushing. This will supersede the infinite variety of great-coats, pea-jackets, &c., now worn according to the taste or fashion of the wearer. Should the old distinguishing marks on the cuffs, to denote the executive rank, be adopted, the introduction of this uniform dress for bad weather will doubtless be a great improvement.

Colonel Baumgardt, of the 2nd or Queen's Regiment, has been appointed Deputy Governor of the Tower, in the room of Colonel Gerwood, deceased. Lord Charles Wellesley is mentioned as likely to have the vacant colonelcy.

THE NEW MONEY-ORDER OFFICE, GENERAL POST-OFFICE.

The admirable system of Registering Letters at the General Post-office, provides a secure mode of transmiting, by post, Bank Notes, Bank-post Bills, Drafts, &c., by means of what are termed "Money Orders;" and so largely has the benefit of this Department been felt by the public, that the business of the Money-Order Office has increased co-extensively with that of the Penny Postage System. Accordingly, it has been found requisite to extend the accommodation of the office; and, with this view, the edifice shown in the annexed Engraving, is now in course of erection, opposite the Castle and Falcon, in Aldersgate-street. It is a handsomely finished elevation, the lower story channeled: the interior is commodiously fitted for extensive business, as are the vaults for the reception of stores, account-books, &c.

Some idea of the extent of the Money-Order Office, with a brief account of its origin, may prove acceptable at this time to our readers:—It was first instituted as a private speculation, by a gentleman named Robert Watts, who was at the time one of the senior clerks in the inland department of the General Post-office. It occurred to this officer that the transmission of small sums by post would prove an advantage to the public, who had at that time no means of sending such amounts except by bankers' orders, attached to which there always was the hazard of miscarriage, delay, or loss. The matter was mentioned to Sir Francis Freeling, the then Secretary to the Post-office, who recommended that the privilege of sending the orders and advices per post should be permitted, as the scheme might materially enhance the revenue of the office. High rates of commission were charged for several years; still, so much did the public value the facility thus afforded, that the business in Foster-lane (where the old Money-Order Office was situated and where it still remained as a private concern) very materially increased. A recommendation, however, was eventually made to the Treasury, that the office should be incorporated with the Post-office, and become thereby part and parcel of that establishment. This was done, and compensation awarded to Mr. Watts for the loss of the pecuniary benefits he realised from his speculation. Subsequently, the rates of commission were much lowered, and the accommodation from time to time extended to places which previously had no Money-Order Office. The following are the present official regulations with reference to the sums charged for commission:—

"Threepence on sums not exceeding two pounds; and on sums above two and not exceeding five pounds, sixpence. Beyond this amount no order is given. Orders are issued and paid in London, and within the three-mile circle, between the hours of ten A.M. and four P.M., and in other places, between the hours of nine A.M. and six P.M., except during the short intervals of time when the letter-boxes are closed for the receipt of packet letters." From a recent return to an order of the House of Commons, it appears that there are appointed to perform the duties of the Money-Order Office, at the present time, the following staff of officers:—One president (Wm. Barth, Esq.), one chief clerk, fifteen senior clerks, twenty-five junior clerks, fifty-three probationary clerks, two provisional clerks, nineteen extra clerks, five messengers, and one porter, which number, we understand, will be considerably increased when the new office is finished. The annual cost for salaries to the above officers amounts to £10,612 12s., independently of 10½d. per hour paid for all extra duties, when required.

NEW MONEY-ORDER OFFICE.

GERALD GAGE; OR, THE SECRET.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SUSAN HOPLEY," ETC.

HE stranger then fell to asking a variety of questions about Mr. Livingstone, as of a person whose great wealth and eccentric character rendered him an object of legitimate curiosity to the world; all of which Mr. Pilrig answered, to the best of his knowledge, with evident pride and pleasure.

"Among other strange peculiarities he has," observed the stranger, "I understand he is determined never to make a will."

"That's a mistake, Sir," said Mr. Pilrig; "he has made a will. And when he had said this, he knitted his brow, folded his lips, and looked out of the corner of his eye at nothing, as who should say, "There's a weighty matter for you! There's a bone for you to pick! I'm not going to say any more; I'm going to think of something else, while you digest that as well as you can."

"Well, said the stranger, in a tone of bonhomie, "I am glad of it—very glad of it, indeed. As I said before, I know nothing of Mr. Livingstone, nor of anybody belonging to him; but I think it's always a pity when a man of his fortune does not provide handsomely for his executions, but allows his wealth to fall into the hands of a single person, who perhaps doesn't deserve it; I mean, of course, where there are no children. I believe Mr. Livingstone is not married? At least, I never understood that he had any family."

"He never was married, Sir," said Mr. Pilrig.

"I thought I had heard as much," replied the stranger, with assumed indifference; "but every man who, like Mr. Livingstone, has been the architect of his own fortune, must, necessarily, have poor relations; brothers and sisters, who have not been able to keep pace with him; nephews and nieces, perhaps, who have no means of rising but through the assistance of their rich uncle. Now, how much better is a fortune bestowed, when divided amongst ten or a dozen such worthy persons, or even half a dozen, than if the whole were accumulated on the head of one thankless, good-for-nothing spendthrift. I trust Mr. Livingstone, under the influence of your advice, has avoided an error so common to wealthy persons."

"Ah, Sir," replied Mr. Pilrig, "if these monied men could be induced to take advice! But when once they have got a crotchet into their heads about the disposal of their property, the devil himself can't get it out again. What would you think, now, if Mr. Livingstone were to leave every stiver of his fortune—a few small annuities excepted—every stiver of his immense fortune to a person who is no relation to him, a person whom he never saw, and not only whom he never saw, but whom he never intends to see! I don't say that it is so; I only ask you if that wouldn't be a whim worthy of a millionaire?"

"God bless me!" exclaimed the stranger, looking astonished, and at the same time mysterious and confidential; as much as to say, "Of course you're quite safe with me, this conversation is strictly private, and will go no further." "God bless me, you don't say so! A person whom he never saw, and whom he never intends to see! It's one of the most singular caprices I ever heard in my life. But what's the motive? What's the connexion?"

"None, Sir; no connexion at all. The young man's a son of an old college chum, a poor parson, who never had more than three hundred a year in his life; and the youth himself no more expects to inherit the fortune than you do."

"What's his name?" asked the stranger.

"Gerald Gage," replied Mr. Pilrig.

Now, when Mr. Pilrig commenced these disclosures, which he had done with the view of giving himself importance, and gaining the confidence of his wealthy fellow-traveller, he had not the most distant intention of exceeding, what he considered, the bounds of prudence and professional faith; but his own vanity and love of talking on the one hand, and the leading questions of the stranger on the other, had enticed him on from one stage to another, till, at last, when the final question was put to him, quite unexpectedly—put, too, with an air that evinced no consciousness of impropriety, nor implied any doubt of a ready answer—he had not presence of mind, or resolution to draw back. To have declined answering would have been a reproof to the asker, well merited, certainly; but the easy confidence and bonhomie of the stranger, disarmed him, his apparent wealth and high connexion dazzled and awed him, and his own imprudence confounded him—so that, well-merited, as he felt it would have been, he had not resolution to administer it. But the words had no sooner passed his lips than he would have given the world to recal them. He cast an uneasy glance at his other two fellow travellers. Jenny Spike was looking out of the window, with an air that plainly indicated it was perfectly indifferent to her who Mr. Livingstone left his fortune to; but the eyes of the impatient gentleman were turned upon him with an expression of the most unbounded amazement.

Mr. Pilrig blushed to his fingers' ends, and felt all over in a heat; he could not wonder at the young man's surprise at such unpardonable indiscretion; he could have bitten off his tongue with vexation; whilst his reverence for the stranger, extinguished by his own mortification, was changed into a feeling very like resentment; and, acting upon the old adage, "when the steed is stolen," he resolved to close his lips for the remainder of the journey, and not answer another question upon any provocation whatever. But this resolution, wise as late, soon appeared to be also superfluous; nobody seemed disposed to ask him any questions. The impatient gentleman, although his countenance still retained its expression of astonishment, and although he cast sundry glances of wonder and curiosity at Mr. Pilrig, continued as silent as before; and the Stranger, seeming suddenly to have caught the infection, said not another word. The silence was first broken by Jenny Spike's inquiring, when they entered Marlborough, if that was Bath; to query which, being addressed to the general society, no one felt himself particularly called upon to respond to, and which, therefore, remained unanswered. The dinner past over sulkily and silently. As it was the depth of winter, and the sky heavy with snow-clouds, the evening soon closed in after they re-entered the coach, and it became dusk, whereupon the whole party drew into their respective corners, and either went to sleep, or pretended to do so. Jenny's head, however, was the only one whose nodding betokened a genuine slumber, which was first disturbed by the rattling of the coach over the paved streets of Bath. Everybody looked through the windows as the coach dashed through the lighted thoroughfares, till a sudden stop at the door of the White Hart, announced that those who were going no further than Bath had reached their destination.

The moment the coachman drew up his horses, and before the door could be opened to liberate the passengers, a person, who had been standing at the inn door, advanced, and, putting his head in at the window, appeared to be looking for somebody; but the passengers were in the shade, and undistinguishable.

"I have a letter," said he, in a hesitating voice, "for a gentleman that was to come by this coach."

But though the passengers were in the shade, the light fell sufficiently upon the face of the messenger to admit of their seeing him, and the impatient traveller immediately held out his hand, as if recognising the man had satisfied him that the packet was for himself.

"Stay!" exclaimed Mr. Pilrig, stretching out his head also, "I expected a letter to meet me here. Perhaps it's for me?"

"No, Sir," replied the messenger, who by this time had caught a glimpse of the impatient traveller's physiognomy—"No, Sir, it's for this gentleman—it's for Mr. Gerald Gage."

CHAPTER II.

Before the unexpected announcement with which we closed our last Chapter, had well escaped the lips of the messenger, Mr. Gerald Gage was upon the pavement. "Get my portmanteau;" said he; "it's in the boot, I believe, and take it home. Tell my father I will be there by-and-by."

"I believe master wished to see you, Sir," answered the man, touching his hat, "before you go any where else."

"Do what I tell you, will you?" said the young man impatiently, as he turned to walk away "

"Sir, Sir, give me leave—allow me—one word, before you go," cried Mr. Pilrig, hastening after him—"one word I beg of you."

"I'm in a hurry, Sir," replied Gerald, "some other time."

"I'll not detain you a moment," said Mr. Pilrig, "I'll not detain you at all—I'll walk by your side, if you'll give me leave, while I say a few words, that, a circumstance so unforeseen—a coincidence so extraordinary—so—so unfortunate, if I may venture to say so, has—has rendered necessary. I have been to blame, Sir, very much to blame—I won't attempt to excuse myself—I never was guilty of such a thing in my life, and I'd rather have cut my tongue out than have done it, if I had had time to think what I was about. But I was surprised into it—taken unawares—but, as I said before, Sir, I won't attempt to excuse myself. I know it's impossible—but, good God! Sir, when I think what the consequences may be, the consequences to you, Sir, if Mr. Livingstone only suspected that you had got an inkling of the matter—such an odd man, Sir, a man of the most eccentric character. I say, Sir, when I think of what the consequences of my impudence may be—he'd alter his will, Sir, he'd alter it that very hour—"

"And not employ you to make the alteration, I fancy," said Gerald Gage.

"That's nothing, Sir," panted out Mr. Pilrig, "I'm not to be considered—I should get but what I deserve—but you, Sir; the loss of such a fortune—thousands upon thousands—I won't say it may not be a million—a word, Sir, a single word—a hint, and it's all smoke, Sir, smoke Mr. Livingstone's an old man too, Sir. It is but keeping silence for a few years—perhaps a few months—and then, Sir, what a thing to step into no—incumbrance—every thing clear as the back of my hand—such a fine property—every thing so well secured—so, so desirable, Sir, in every way—and to lose it all for—for—just for—"

But, by the time he had reached this point of his discourse, Mr. Pilrig was fairly done up. Mr. Gerald Gage was a tall, slender young man, with long legs, and wind like a race horse. Mr. Pilrig was the reverse of all the; added to which, his expenditure of breath, betwixt his agitation and his eloquence, was tremendous. So, seizing the young man's arm in the desperation of his distress, he exclaimed, in the most earnest voice that his lungs would permit, "For God's sake, Sir, stop! stop and speak!"

"What would you have me say, Sir?" said Gerald Gage, abruptly turning round and facing him.

"I want you to reflect, Sir, upon the consequences—" began Mr. Pilrig.

"I have no time to reflect, Sir," replied the impatient youth; "besides, Sir, it's you that should have reflected on the consequences. But, in two words, what is it you want of me?"

"I want you, Sir, to promise that you will never let the secret pass your lips—that you will never mention to anybody whatsoever—the—the circumstance that I have been so unlucky as to—to—"

"Why, Sir," interrupted Gerald, "I think I have pretty strong reasons for not mentioning it, since I do not doubt the truth of what you assert, namely, that Mr. Livingstone would alter his intentions if he supposed they were suspected. I only wish you had been as cautious as I shall be. How do you know, Sir, that the fellow you have been talking to in the coach will not blazon it all over Bath to-morrow; and that we may not see it in one of the evening papers by the next night?"

"I hope not, Sir," said Mr. Pilrig; "a gentleman of his fortune and standing in society would be above doing such a piece of mischief. But I shall hasten back directly, and speak to him on the subject, and endeavour to obtain his promise."

"Then, the sooner you go the better. Sir," said Gerald, "and pray learn to be a little more cautious in your communications for the future."

"I shall, Sir; you may rely on it, I shall," said the humbled Mr. Pilrig, as he turned his steps towards the White Hart, whilst the eager young man turned on the way with augmented velocity, to make up for the time he had lost in the above conversation. But, by the time the lawyer reached the inn, the coach had departed on its way to Bristol, and, whether the other two inside passengers had gone on with it, or had remained in Bath, the waiter could not inform him. He rather thought he had seen a young woman assisting to carry her box for her; but, with respect to the gentleman, he had not observed him at all. There was nothing left, therefore, but to trust to the stranger's discretion; but Mr. Pilrig felt an uneasy conviction that people that ask indiscreet questions are not to be good keepers of counsel; and, although he tried to banish the thing from his mind, and to hope for the best, yet he could not recover his former compaisance. The consciousness of his imprudence sat heavy on his mind, which occasioned the Welsh rabbit he ate for supper to sit heavy on his stomach. He passed a bad night; his mind was disturbed, and his body restless. He had not only perilled the young man's fortune; but, what was worse, he had perilled his own; just, too, as it was taking a favourable turn. He had not much distrust of the woman; he thought she had probably not attended to, or not understood, the conversation, sufficiently to comprehend the importance of what had passed, or its connexion with the final discovery. The stranger was his bête noire, and he resolved to pass the following day in hunting for him through the streets and public resorts of Bath, in order, if he could find him, to make an appeal to his honour and good-nature on the subject. But his labour was vain. Unfortunately, he did not know his name; otherwise, he concluded, a man of such eminence would have been easily discovered; and, after bestowing more time on the ineffectual search, than he had to spare from his other business, and making vain enquiries of the coachman, who knew nothing about him, he was obliged to return to London, and present himself before his wealthy client, with the painful consciousness that he had betrayed his trust, and a distressing uncertainty of the use that might be made of his imprudence.

In the meantime, Mr. Gerald Gage pursued his course with eager steps, through street after street, to the outskirts of the city, till he reached a small house, that formed one of a row, called Prospect-place—although, whatever it once might have had, its only prospect, now, was the back of a similar row of houses on the opposite side of the way.

"She is still up," said he to himself, as he cast up his eyes to a window in the second floor, through which a faint light glimmered; "that's fortunate, for I should have gone mad before to-morrow, if I had not seen her;" and, so saying, he advanced eagerly to the door, and knocked.

"I am not too late to see Miss Dering, I perceive," said he to a respectably-dressed woman, whose appearance denoted her to be the mistress of the house.

"No, Sir," said the woman, half smiling as she admitted him; "you're time enough yet; but we shan't have Miss Dering much longer, I fancy: I suppose you've heard, Sir. I'm sure everybody is so glad, for a more deserving young lady never breathed; and it was a real pity to see a lady that had been brought up to a carriage, and had the first of educations, and of company too, reduced to such straits as she has been. Few know, Sir, but me, what she's had to struggle with, for she always tried to make the best of things, and never complained; but many a day, to my certain knowledge, a bit of meat has never passed her lips; and a cup of tea and an egg has been all the nourishment she afforded herself. But they say, when things get to the worst, they must mend; and I trust, poor young lady, she has seen her worst days, and that she'll be happy with Mr. Weston as she deserves to be; for they say he's an excellent gentleman; and, no doubt, he has a fine fortune, and can keep her as she ought to be kept."

And, as the worthy woman liked Miss Dering, and delighted in the sound of her own voice, there is no telling to what length the thread of her discourse might have run out, but, just as she concluded the last paragraph, the flame of the candle she held in her right hand having communicated itself to the wick of the one she held in her left, Mr. Gerald Gage, without pausing to listen to what further she might have to say, snatched the latter from her hand, and, ascending the narrow staircase by two steps at a time, was at the door of Miss Dering's apartment before the echo of Mrs. Venn's last words had died away in the passage below.

"Come in," said a sweet female voice, as the handle of the door, half turning, indicated that some one was there. "Is it you, Mrs. Venn?"

There was but one dim light in the room, a table, beside which the fair tenant of the room sat, diligently plying her needle, when Gerald threw open the door; and, as he stood there in silence, she started from her seat at perceiving the figure of a man.

"Don't be alarmed, Emily," said he, "it's only me!"

"Is rain!" exclaimed she, in an accent of surprise.

"Yes, Emily," answered he, "it's Gerald; the person you least expected, I fancy, and, perhaps, least wished to see."

"I did not expect you, certainly," replied she.

"I understood from your father, that, when your shooting was over, you were to spend the rest of the vacation in London, with the Millers."

"Is that a reproach, Emily?" said he. "If it is, I deserve it; richly I deserve it. It's quite true, I did mean to have finished the vacation in London."

"And why should you not?" said she. "It would have been a great pity not to have availed yourself of so pleasant an invitation."

"So I thought, Emily!" replied Gerald; and therefore I accepted it. But I should have remembered how easily the absent are forgotten, and have been less confident."

"Confident of what, Gerald?" asked Miss Dering, raising her eyes to his face.

"Of what I thought was my own—of your affection, Emily!" said he.

"That would have been a strange confidence, had you entertained it," said she, assuming more coldness.

"It will not, if misunderstand you, Emily," answered Gerald. "You think I have neglected you; and perhaps you are justified in thinking so. The truth is, I have been too confident. I thought myself so secure of your affection, that I have not taken sufficient pains to keep alive a sentiment that I fancied too firmly rooted in your heart to be easily ejected.

"You have then been greatly mistaken," said Miss Dering, calmly. The sentiment you allude to, and the existence of which I do not intend to deny, was awakened by your kindness—shown when I most needed it—but with that kindness it died. Not my gratitude; that still remains, and inspires me with the warmest wishes for your happiness."

"Am I to believe this, Emily?" exclaimed Gerald, throwing himself into a chair, and forcing her to seat herself beside him. "I cannot believe it; if I did, there would be but one step between that conviction and a——. But I did not come here to threaten you—that would be like a blackguard; but I came to know my fate definitively; and then, when I know it, ——"

"What then?" asked Emily, as he paused.

"No matter what," answered Gerald; "to you it will, of course, be indifferent—but this night must decide. Mr. Weston is rich, I know it, and I am poor. It is true, you plighted your faith to me, and we exchanged vows of never-ending love; but faith has been broken and vows cannot bind a fickle heart. If you have actually changed—say so; and, however hard it may be, I will believe yourself against yourself. But oh, Emily, if, as I believe, your heart is still mine—for I have that confidence in your truth, that what appears arrogance in me is but trust in you—if you are sacrificing yourself to pique, or selling yourself for wealth——"

"For wealth! For bread, you mean;" interrupted Miss Dering. "I never desired wealth, nor do I desire it now; but neither am I sacrificing myself. It is true I am not in love with Mr. Weston, neither does he suppose I am. He is of an age to want a kind and faithful companion; and I need a home and a protector. I am satisfied of his worth; and he is satisfied that I shall honestly and cheerfully fulfil the duties I undertake. In short, it is a union of prudence on both sides, and therefore likely to be a happy one."

"If your heart is free from any other attachment it might," replied Gerald; "but is it so? Question it, Emily. I know you better than you know yourself. I estimate better your unchanging constancy, the unalienable nature of your affections: it has been on that acquaintance with your character that I have presumed too far. You have felt your self neglected, and are justly displeased, and you mistake pique and displeasure for indifference. But you will awaken from that delusion by-and-by, when it's too late, and find yourself miserable!"

"No, Gerald!" replied Emily; "no; I'm sure I shall be happy in doing my duty." But her lip trembled, and her voice faltered, as she spoke.

"I tell you, no, Emily!" said Gerald. "If, indeed, you had supposed I had ceased to love you, time and absence and indignation might have banished my image from your heart; and you might then, perhaps, have found your happiness—an insipid, joyless happiness—in the performance of the duties you speak of; but it is too late, Emily; it can never be so now. You know it yourself—you feel it. You can never marry Mr. Weston, for now it would be a sacrifice—a hateful sacrifice—a sacrifice from which your heart recoils."

"Then, Oh, Gerald!" exclaimed Miss Dering, bursting into tears, "Oh, Gerald, Gerald! how selfish and how cruel it was of you to come!"

RUMOURED MINISTERIAL CHANGES.—The Sun, of Thursday evening, says:—"The rumour is revived that Lord Lyndhurst is about to resign the Great Seal, for reasons unconnected with Ministerial policy. It has been strongly rumoured in Westminster Hall that Mr. Pemberton Leigh has resisted most earnest solicitations from the Premier and the Duke of Wellington to succeed to the Woolsack; and that, in consequence, the following arrangements are contemplated: Sir Edward Sugden to be Lord Chancellor; Sir F. Thesiger, Lord Chancellor of Ireland; and Mr. James Wortley to be the new Solicitor-General, the present Solicitor-General becoming, of course, Attorney General

THE FUNERAL OF EARL GRANVILLE.—On Wednesday morning the mortal remains of the late Earl Granville were removed from the family residence, in Bruton-street, to be conveyed by railway to Wilmcote, and thence to Stone Park, Staffordshire, to be interred in the family vault, in Stone Church. The funeral was conducted in the most private and unostentatious manner possible, for all the arrangements from the royal Family and noble personages had their carriages to follow were declined. The interment took place in the afternoon. The Earl Granville, the Hon. Fred Leveson, Mr. Fullerton, Mr. Stuart, and Dr. Vereday, left by the earliest train, to attend the solemn obsequies.

PEACE AND THE OREGON QUESTION.—It has been suggested by some of the advocates of the cause of Peace, that friendly addresses, from the Merchants of this country to the Merchants of America, as fellow-citizens of the world, mutually dependent the one upon the other, would, at the present juncture, be very seasonable, and would exert a decidedly salutary influence on the public mind in both nations. These addresses to be short; to deprecate so dire a calamity as War, and contrast with it the untold blessings of Peace; to acknowledge the absolute dependence of Commerce on Peace; and to urge NATIONAL ARBITRATION for the adjustment of NATIONAL DISPUTES.

NOTHING could be better devised than NICOLL'S REGISTERED FROCK, for it suits the seasons, is adapted for the changes that all now does, not only the size gas non of the railway traveller, but is equally so for any gentleman taking out-door exercise. It may be said distinctly to mark the costume of the nineteenth century, if that is rightly called marked which is only conspicuous for an unpretending and graceful bearing, the wearer feeling as much at ease. Certainly as it is observed, it is patronised highly, and it is also a general public favourite, being as peculiarly English, and as chiming all fashion extravagance of style. It must be acknowledged as a vast improvement over the old great coat, associated in our remembrance with an uncomfortable sensation of night buttonings, which from its very clumsiness, defeated its object, the warmth of the person, as interfering with the proper circulation of the blood. The principal loans are blues, blue, brown, and olive, also the clerical intricate, called Oxford and can be had of the patentees, or of many of the most respectable houses out of London. I've got my own lute home again,
But ah, how changed its tone!
The sound of its once happy strain
For ever now is gone.
Its gentle murmurs, loved so much,
Have turned to noisy mirth;
And oh! it had one fairy touch
I would not lose for earth.

3.

The chord that wakened to that touch
Was strung by Jove's own hand;
And its wild melody was such
As heart could not withstand.
But hatred now is where love thrilled;
Hope's cheering sounds are fled;
And Memory's urn is sadly filled
With ashes of the dead!

THE OPENING OF PARLIAMENT.

HER MAJESTY'S SPEECH.

The purpose of the Speech delivered from the Throne at the opening of the Session of Parliament is to shadow forth, in general terms, the direction and tendency of the leading Legislative measures to be brought forward by the Ministers of the Crown. It is not intended that the Sovereign should enter into details, or allude to specific points of those measures; any expression of opinion on the part of the Crown, in anticipation of the discussions on the several portions of a great plan or scheme of policy, would appear like dictation, and be, in fact, an infringement of that perfect liberty of debate which is one of the highest privileges of the Commons of England. The general style in which Royal Speeches are drawn up is often made the subject of censure; but there is a Constitutional reason for it, and, though that generality has sometimes been allowed to fall into vagueness and obscurity, yet, of late years, this fault has been avoided, and the people have derived from the Royal Address a pretty clear intimation of the course of policy to be pursued on public affairs. The Address of her Majesty to the assembled Lords and Commons, on Thursday last, is a very fair specimen of these State documents: details we cannot gather from it, but the direction of the "Movement" is pretty clearly perceptible. We subjoin it here.—

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"It gives me great satisfaction again to meet you in Parliament, and to have the opportunity of recurring to your assistance and advice.

"I continue to receive from my allies, and from other Foreign Powers, the strongest assurances of their desire to cultivate the most friendly relations with this country.

"I rejoice that, in concert with the Emperor of Russia, and through the success of our joint mediation, I have been enabled to adjust the differences which had long prevailed between the Ottoman Porte and the King of Persia, and had seriously endangered the tranquillity of the East.

"For several years a desolating and sanguinary warfare has afflicted the states of the Rio de la Plata. The commerce of all nations has been interrupted, and acts of barbarity have been committed, unknown to the practice of a civilized people. In conjunction with the King of the French, I am endeavouring to effect the pacification of those states.

"The convention concluded with France in the course of the last year, for the more effectual suppression of the slave trade, is about to be carried into immediate execution by the active co-operation of the two Powers on the coast of Africa.

"It is my desire that our present union, and the good understanding which so happily exists between us, may always be employed to promote the interests of humanity, and to secure the peace of the world.

"I regret that the conflicting claims of Great Britain and the United States, in respect of the territory on the north-western coast of America, although they have been made the subject of repeated negociation, still remain unsettled.

"You may be assured that no effort, consistent with national honour, shall be wanting on my part to bring this question to an early and peaceful termination.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"The estimates for the year will be laid before you at an early period. Although I am deeply sensible of the importance of enforcing economy in all branches of the expenditure, yet I have been compelled by a due regard to the exigencies of the public service, and to the state of our naval and military establishments, to propose some increase in the estimates which provide for their efficiency.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I have observed with deep regret, the very frequent instances in which the crime of deliberate assassination has been of late committed in Ireland.

"It will be your duty to consider whether any measures can be devised calculated to give increased protection to life, and to bring to justice the perpetrators of so dreadful a crime.

"I have to lament that, in consequence of a failure of the potato crop in several parts of the United Kingdom, there will be a deficient supply of an article of food which forms the chief subsistence of great numbers of my people. The disease by which the plant has been affected has prevailed to the greatest extent in Ireland.

"I have adopted all such precautions as it was in my power to adopt for the purpose of alleviating the sufferings which may be caused by this calamity; and I shall confidently rely on your co-operation in devising such other means for effecting the same benevolent purpose, as may require the sanction of the Legislature.

"I have had great satisfaction in giving my assent to the measures which you have presented to me from time to time calculated to extend commerce and to stimulate domestic skill and industry by the repeal of prohibitory and the relaxation of protective duties.

"The prosperous state of the revenue, the increased demand for labour, and the general improvement which has taken place in the internal condition of the country, are strong testimonies in favour of the course you have pursued.

"I recommend you to take into your early consideration whether the principles on which you have acted may not with advantage be yet more extensively applied, and whether it may not be in your power, after a careful review of the existing duties upon many articles, the produce or manufacture of other countries, to make such further reductions and remissions as may tend to ensure the continuance of the great benefits to which I have adverted, and, by enlarging our commercial intercourse, to strengthen the bonds of amity with Foreign Powers.

"Any measures which you may adopt for effecting these great objects will, I am convinced, be accompanied by such precautions as shall prevent permanent loss to the revenue, or injurious results to any of the great interests of the country.

"I have full reliance on your just and dispassionate consideration of matters so deeply affecting the public welfare.

"It is my earnest prayer that with the blessing of Divine Providence on your councils, you may be enabled to promote friendly feelings between different classes of my subjects, provide additional security for the continuance of peace, and to maintain contentment and happiness at home, by increasing the comforts and bettering the condition of the great body of my people."

Passing over the allusions to the friendly relations of this country with Foreign Powers, and the notices of negotiations closed or progressing, the first striking paragraph is that containing the reference to our Oregon dispute with the United States. We gather from it a determination fully to assert the "national honour" in the question; and it may be taken as an assurance that from the just claims of this country there will not be the slightest departure.

The increase in our Military forces plainly intimated, may be in some degree a consequence of the preceding paragraph; but the immense extent of our foreign possessions, and the duty they impose on our troops, have long rendered such a step all but inevitable.

We next gather that measures of stringency are in preparation for those districts in Ireland where the assassin seems to murder with impunity. It is an acknowledgment that, after a long trial, the ordinary powers of the law are found insufficient for the preservation of peace. Let us hope the Legislature will go deeper than this; the dreadful effects of discontent must be repressed, but there should be also an attempt to remedy the causes of such social disorder.

It is the remaining portion of the Royal Speech that, at this moment, possesses the greatest importance. The "satisfaction" expressed at the result of the past relaxations of the prohibitive and protective system, results described as a "prosperous state of the Revenue, the increased demand for labour," and the general improvement which has taken place in the internal condition of the country," is the prelude and introduction to that intimation of a farther progress in the same direction, which the public has been led to expect would be made. Parliament is recommended to take into its "early consideration" a yet more extensive application of the same principles. And on Monday evening the Premier submits the plan that it must consider.

We gather from the Speech that it will not be by any means limited to the Corn Laws; it will embrace "many articles, the produce or manufacture of foreign countries;" it is more than probable that the proposition will be bolder and more comprehensive than the Tariff of 1842. But so near the time of certainty speculation is needless. We may remark, however, that it appears singular the great topic, the Corn Laws, should not be expressly mentioned, or alluded to.

Whatever may be the differences hereafter excited, sure we are that every man will heartily respond to the prayer with which her Majesty concludes her gracious Address, that the Councils of our Legislators may "promote friendly feelings between different classes of my subjects, provide additional security for the continuance of peace, and to maintain contentment and happiness at home, by increasing the comforts and bettering the condition of the great body of my people."

THE HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

The present Session of Parliament is the last that will sit in the remains—the patched-up ruins—of the old Houses of Legislation. It is generally supposed that one branch of it, the Peers, will, in the ensuing Session, be accomodated in the new edifice that so grandly flanks the "silent highway," even if the more numerous section, the Commons, have to wait yet another year. The impatience of the Peers themselves, has somewhat hastened the application of their part of the building to its final purpose. Lord Brougham, assuming the office of spokesman of the malcontents, has, on more than one occasion, drawn lamentable pictures of his own sufferings from the cold in the day, during the hearing of appeals, and the intense heat in the night, while attending debates; the alternations being so severe as to rank only next in degree to the same punishment as described in Dante's "Inferno;" he was joined by others in testimonies partaking more or less of the pathetic; and, though the Lord Chancellor, so comfortably "wrapped, and thoroughly lapped" in the robes of office, did somewhat gibe and jeer at the comparative nakedness of Brougham and Campbell, in respect to that kind of investiture to the lack of which he rather slily attributed their greater chilliness, yet, certain it is, that the inconvenience and discomfort of the present House of Lords are considerable. And it is nearly, if not quite, equalled in these respects by the House of Commons.

To the occasional visitor this is not so apparent as to the members of those bodies. To the eye of the stranger nothing can exceed the appearance of comfort presented by the interior of the House of Lords. The soft carpeting, the well-cushioned benches, the padded doors that open and shut so noiselessly, the draped windows, the solid-looking woolsack, and the warm colour (scarlet) of everything the eye falls upon, give a feeling of warmth and luxury. There is no noise of footsteps, for the tread is on a material whose softness returns no echo. All is ease, quiet, and dignified composure; the spirit of the place even extends to its occupants. With occasional exceptions, and those only on extraordinary subjects, the manner of conducting the debates and business of the Lords wears the character of a drawing-room conversation; the rules are not so strict, nor by any means so strictly enforced, as in the Commons. Their Lordships are collectively the conservatives of "order;" there is no one watchful and presiding eye and ear to note every departure from it, and check it instantly; and, as "everybody's business is nobody's," scenes of very gentlemanly and well-bred confusion are of frequent occurrence, several noble Lords speaking at once or trying to do so, or one speaking several times on the same question—an enormity never permitted for an instant in the Lower House. All this gives an air of private life, ease, and freedom to the whole place, which is greatly assisted by the limited size of the apartment devoted to the "Pillars of the State." The library or dining-room of many a noble Lord is far more spacious, and bears a richer air of state, than the hall in which the Aristocracy of Great Britain assemble round the Throne of Majesty.

But, with all its appearance of ease and comfort, the place is, after all, but a patch up and a make shift. It is like the new piece upon the old garment; it has neither the convenience, the space, and the applicability to its purpose of a modern building, nor has it the grand and venerable aspect of antiquity. You see that it was run up to meet the necessity of the hour; like much of the policy of the time, it hides, but does not improve, the work of the past, and is not solid enough to reach into the future. The hand of the tradesman is more visible than that of the architect or the artist; the predominating influence of the place is that of the upholsterer; even the oak panelling is the work of the paper-maker—is, with all reverence be it spoken, a delusion and a sham. We are not reconciled to the idea that the present building was meant to be temporary only. What is meant merely for a few years it would be absurd to build as for centuries; but the defects of such a building are so many, that they naturally cause some anxiety to get out of it as soon as may be.

The House of Commons is, of course, of the same date as the House of Peers, subsequent to the "Great Fire." Nothing of it is old but the shell, formed of the blackened and scorching walls left by that conflagration. Within them the present chamber was built, and in one respect there is less incongruity about it than the Upper House; not the least attempt has been made to throw a spice of the Gothic into the fittings up; the Peers have some faint and sickly approaches to that style, but the Commons have adopted the pure parish vestry-room order, in all its native ugliness. The Peers have at least provided for the eye a rich and warm mixture of colour; the Commons have thought of such only as vanity. All is plain to excess; a plain matting on the floor; plain painted wooden benches, with very plain green leather cushions; two plain galleries, resting on plain iron pillars, and a plain clock, which has certainly the merit of very plainly showing the time, thus leaving no excuse to those who occupy more than their share of it. Around, above, beneath, all is the perfection of homeliness and common-place; there is not one spot that attracts the eye so as to a point to vary attention from the general Quaker-like hue, except, perhaps, the Mace, and those mysterious red boxes at either end of it, which have never been opened in the memory of the oldest inhabitant of those localities. A more uninviting, uninteresting apartment it would be impossible to find in the Three Kingdoms. We have seen many a Council-room in a provincial borough far superior to it: the Council-chamber in the Guildhall of the City of London, compared with it, is as one of the palaces of the art-loving Medici to the board-room of a Union Workhouse.

But, if the eye has been less consulted than in the Lords, in other respects the Lower Chamber may claim a superiority. It is more used, and by greater numbers. The larger attendance of members, and their longer sittings, have compelled them, in self-defence, to adopt a better system of heating and ventilation. Though improvement is possible in both respects, yet, on the whole, the plan adopted succeeds in securing a great amount of comfort, both in the degree of the temperature and the purity of the atmosphere—Mr. Wakley to the contrary notwithstanding. We do not know any apartment of the same size, in which so many could meet at once and remain so long, with so little inconvenience, as in the House of Commons.

As far as mere utility goes, nothing is gained to a Senate or Legislature by the splendour of its place of meeting. The real power of the British Parliament is greater than that of all the deliberative bodies that have sat amid the gorgeousness of the Palaces of Venice or Florence. It deals with greater revenues, and governs a wider empire than were ever yet found united under one sceptre. Englishmen think nothing of the meanness and poverty of the present seat of this powerful Assembly. It is the national character to avoid display: we like to be rich rather than to seem so; and when a temporary shelter was being formed for the Legislature, it would have been out of the question to have lavished upon it the resources of architecture and painting. It is only when we observe Foreigners within its walls that we feel somewhat humiliated by the comparison we know they must make between the splendour, external and internal, of their public edifices, and the meanness of ours. Let any one run his eye along the whole fabric that extends from the corner of Palace Yard to the entrance of the House of Lords—a space that includes the Courts where our laws are administered, and the Chambers of Legislation; yet what a miserable spectacle of dilapidation, made more unsightly by repairs, does much of it present. Who, when looking at it, does not wish to hasten the time when we shall see completed that magnificent pile that is to supersede it? In that the architect has raised for ages to come, an edifice in which, as in our noble Constitution, old forms and principles are adapted to modern requirements, enlarged and extended rather than changed. The present mean and unsubstantial chambers will soon disappear like the fancies of a dream, and their occupants will take up their abode in what will be their "abiding city." And while the last Session is opening that will see the whole of our Legislature sitting amid the ruins of its ancient halls, it is a fair opportunity of giving a slight sketch of our present defects, while anticipating a future, in which all that the arts can do will be called forth to give BEAUTY and SPLENDOUR to the seat and centre of POWER!

PRESENT STATE OF THE NEW HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

At the opening of another Session of Parliament, it will, doubtless, be interesting to our readers to be in possession of the present state of the New Houses of Parliament, or, as they are now officially styled, "Westminster New Palace." With this impression, by the courtesy of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, and of the architect, Mr. Barry, we have obtained admission to the works, a privilege now, of necessity, somewhat restricted. Taking, therefore, in our hand, the amended plan, engraved in No. 74 of THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, we have made a détour of the progressing pile, and proceed to submit the results of the visit to our readers. We may, however, first mention that the above Plan has more than once been referred to in Parliament, as the most correct that has been published; and, in our comparison of it with the portions executed, we have scarcely found any deviation.

With regard to the building itself, no very considerable advance has been made with the exterior since the Architect's Report, dated Jan. 3, 1845. The centre and curtain portions of the River Front were then roofed in. The East and West Wings have also since been roofed; and have mostly received the Turrets and Pinnacles surmounting them; with the exception of the extreme tower abutting on Westminster-bridge. Our Artist has engraved one of the Towers in this, the East Wing, entire, and in detail, as a specimen of the elaborate beauty of the sculptural enrichment. The enlarged details are:—1. A Pinnacle and weather vane. 2. A portion of the pierced embattled parapet and upper tracery of windows. 3. An upper window, complete. 4. Panels above the lower windows. The Royal Arms, supported by Justice and Mercy: the side panels bearing mottoes, intertwined with the rose, thistle, and shamrock. 5. Canopied niches, from the lower story. 6. Panels between other stories in the wing.

A glance at the entire Tower will convey to the reader some idea of the skill of the architect in picturesque combinations of some of the most beautiful details of the architectural and sculptural decorations of the later or Perpendicular style. The highly enriched panels of the main tower are admirably relieved by the blanks of the turrets, in their turn, surmounted by pierced canopies, with richly-gilt vanes. Then, too, how are the central canopied niches and their statues set off by their flanking panels; and the badges beneath the third story windows aid the effect of the more important heraldic richness displayed below. The statues, or rather statuettes by the way, are beautifully executed: they number crowned sovereigns, mitred churchmen, and saintly women,—and are clever impersonations of historical character.

Of the completed River Front, we shall only observe that it has been greatly improved by the addition of a central Tower to the original plan.

On the land side, the principal portion completed is that which will form the north side of New Palace-yard, or the intended quadrangle. It may be as well here to state that, according to the Architect's Plan, as submitted to the Courts of Law and Equity Committee, "he intends to inclose New Palace-yard entirely by a range of building on its north side, extending from the Clock Tower to the end of Bridge-street; and by another on the west side, along Margaret-street, as far as the south end of Westminster Hall; between which two new ranges of building the north-west angle will be cut off by a deep and spacious gateway, leading into the quadrangle (Fig. 1 by 170 feet) in front of the Hall. That this will be a very great improvement cannot be doubted, because that

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

There is nothing of striking interest in the French papers. They indulge in conjectures as to the course about to be pursued by Sir Robert Peel in regard to the Corn-laws; and most of them are of opinion, that the right hon. Baronet will not be able to carry their repeal. The Parisian journalists also discuss the Oregon question, which they consider to be fraught with difficulty, if not danger to England.

The debate in the Chamber of Peers, which was as unusually protracted one, concluded on Friday (last week), when the Chamber divided, and there appeared—

For the address	..	..	..	120
Against it	..	..	..	23
Majority for Ministers	..	..	..	—97

The minority being but 23, shows that Ministers have, irrespectively of the large creation of Peers since last session, gained upon their opponents, for as many as 40 Peers divided against Government upon different occasions last year, while the vote of the late debate proves, in the opinion of

NATIONAL SPORTS.

A COCKNEY COURSING.

To what base uses we may come at last!—SHAKSPEARE.

Some weeks ago we promised, before the end of the season, to exhibit to the reader one of our great national meetings of the leash - a coursing, whereat even Old North himself might be present both with pleasure and profit. And this is saying no small thing, for, in his sporting jacket, Christopher is the very genius of generous wood-craft. Nay, never take it on our word; but read and learn the fact from his own words; digest it with the spice, the aroma of his stirring page. . . . .

"What signifies any sport in the open air, except in congenial scenery of earth and heaven? Go, thou gentle Cockney, and course a suburban hare in the purlieus of Blackheath: but, hold Englishman, come with us, and course an animal that never heard a City bell, by day or a hare, by night an old woman that loves the dogs she dreads, and hunt her as you will, with a lead, and a half nightcloth, still returns at dark to the same form in the turf dyke of the garden of the Mountain Cottage . . . What are your great big fat lazy English hares, ten and twelve pounds and upwards, who have the blood brought to their very mouths in preserves, that are out of breath with five minutes scamper among themselves, to the middle sized, hard-lipped, wiry-backed, steel-legged, long-winded mawkins of Scotland, that seem to taste the leaf of a single cabbage in the new mown land yards that feed them, but prey in distant fields, take a breathing every gloaming along the mountain breast untired as young eagles ringing the sky for pastime, and before the dogs seem not so much mouthing for life as for pleasure; with much air of freedom, liberty, and independence do they fling up the moss and crack their feeds in the faces of their pursuers. Yet stinch are they to the spune, strong to bone, and sound in bottom. See how Tickler clears that twenty-foot moss-hag at a single spang, like a bird—tops that hedge, that would turn any hunter that ever startled in Melton Mowbray, and then, at full speed, northward moves, as upon a pivot, within his own length, and takes down with his haunches, without losing a foot off within a point of due south. . . . . Line is formed, and we march towards the hills. An old shepherd meets us on the long, sloping, trailing ridge, and, putting his brown hand to his mouth in his gnostic nose, intimates that she is in her old form, behind the dyke. Scho!—scho! scho! for a moment the seemingly horned creature appears to gally with the danger, and to linger on the lea ground, but not enough to her shoulders, and away—like thoughts pursuing thoughts—away fly hare and hounds towards the mountains. Stand still for a moment for not a bush the height of our knee to break the view and is not that a bratting burst up the brae—beautiful exceedingly!—and sufficient to chain in admiration the bestings of the rudest gazer's heart? Yes, of all beautiful sights, none, none, none so much so as the murmurless motion of a four-footed wild animal, charged at once from a seaming inert sod or stone, into flight, fleet as that of the falcon's wing."

Some eight and forty hours ago, we were flavouring our rasher of bacon and cup of strong black tea with the chapter wherein the foregoing extract occurs; a portion, when a knock at our sanctum door announced the old boy of all work, who constitutes the male portion of our suburban establishment. "If you please," he said, "the Old Deer Park Club is going to have a day's training on the Hurst—the hoss would be all the better of a canter—suppose you throw a leg over him for a hour." The proposal was too reasonable to be negatived—so towards noon we arrived at the scene of action. Mouldey Hurst will go down to posterity as a classic spot—where once the nobility fought with fire-arms, and the mobility with arms "less nice." It hath now fallen upon more household days and duties. That this, what is here written, may be proved to the satisfaction, the reader, when our grand meeting of the leash see the light, needs but—

On Thursday last there was a Cockney Coursing, on Moulsey Hurst. Soon after one P.M., the sportsmen might be seen ferrying over from the Bell, and eke many another public. The race course at Hampton hath but a single tree—just one more than the race course of Newmarket. Hard by this unbrageous solitude was the tryst; while adjacent, to leeward of a ditch, was the refectory—the apparatus of a "baked tater all hot" man—in the present instant devoted to mutton pies. We say nothing of the confectionery, but there may be found entered enough to hint that if any one has lost his dog Pincher in those parts, there's no need of a conjuror to discover where he's buried. Well, last arrived the hares—devoted creatures—just caught in Kew Gardens, and brought to the sacrifice in boxes, symbolical of their fates like nothing in timber so much as pauper coffins. The sacrificial incense—in shape of unodorous cigars—being set alight, pass the first was enlarged, and gobbled up before you could say Jack Robinson. A hare followed—and another, and another—a grim catalogue; each affording about the amount of sport young gentlemen home for the holidays extract out of the whey of a bread cat. It was said the courses were for stakes of a sovereign entries: very dear at the price.

We presently turned from the scene, with a gallant officer, quartered at Hampton Court, whose opinion of the woodcut was similar to our own; we bewailed together the chance which exposed people to such resources against the enemy. We spoke of degeneracy, generally apropos of going down the hill individually, he said—"and do you know that Vivian, the celebrated steeple-chase horse, is drawing a coal-cart here at Hampton?" We parted at the bridge, and turning our faces towards our Penates, murmured whilst thinking of Vivian and the coursing company—

"To what base uses we may come at last."

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—Although objected against, on the ground that the weights are set too low, the Chester Cup promises to be the "grand coup" of the spring campaign; the Newmarket Handicap, which, properly handled, might have shaken its hold on the betting public, having proved a decided failure. At present the only horses really in force are Warp, Best Bower, and Micky Free; but as a large acceptance may be relied on, we may look for many other "pots," the leviathan stables at Malton and Middleham have yet to show a horse. The most prominent in demand for the Derby are Sting, Brocardo, Jago, and Fancy Boy; the other favourites are steady, without much doing.

COUNTRY NEWS.

AGRICULTURAL PROTECTION MEETINGS.—The meetings in various parts of the country, in favour of agricultural protection, have been very numerous since our last. There was one at Tenterden, on Saturday, which possessed no feature of remarkable characteristic of the meeting was, that while those present evinced a strong disposition to treat Sir Robert Peel with every possible respect to which a country gentleman, and a kind and courteous neighbour could lay claim, they expressed, at the same time, their most unqualified disapproval of his past political conduct, their want of confidence in him at present, and their distrust of him for the future. Mr. Frye was in the chair, and the attendance was respectable. Mr. Roby moved, "That the present clamour for a repeal of the Corn-laws is unjust and unwarrantable, and does not arise from the high prices, or the necessity of the case; and it is the opinion of this meeting that whoever has the property growth, on an average of the seasons, at less than 56s. per quarter, and all other agricultural produce in proportion." This resolution was carried. In the course of the proceedings, Sir G. Chetwynd said, he could not imagine that the Prime Minister of the Crown would, at the meeting of Parliament, venture to propose an annihilation of the Corn-laws. He (Sir G. Chetwynd) had read on the previous night the speech made by Sir R. Peel on the 10th of June last, and, judging from the sentiments contained in that speech, he could not imagine that Sir R. Peel would abolish the Corn laws. Several resolutions against a free trade in corn were agreed to.

ELECTION FOR BUCKINGHAM.—On Tuesday, Colonel Hall, of the Guards, was elected for the borough of Buckingham, without opposition, in the room of Sir J. Chetwode, deceased. The gallant Colonel, in returning thanks, said he would support the Corn-laws, would show his loyalty to his Sovereign, his support to the Church, and would consider well the Poor-laws, in order to give the labourer all the assistance he could. He would do his best to assist the town, and would always be glad to hear from them, and he hoped his conduct would meet with their support.

CORN-LAW MEETING AT NORWICH.—A meeting of the Free-trade Association was held at St. Andrew's Hall, Norwich, on Monday evening. The Hall was intensely crowded, in expectation that Mr. Wodehouse, the member for East Norfolk, would endeavour to controvert the arguments of Mr. Cobden. After a speech from Mr Cobden, however, Mr. Wodehouse did not attempt to prove the advantages of the Corn-laws, but confined himself to an amendment, deprecating the proceedings of the League. This amendment was negatived and a resolution against the Corn-laws and complimentary to the League was carried.

LAMENTABLE DEATH OF THE REV. VAUGHAN THOMAS.—A lamentable instance of the mutability of human life occurred on Tuesday week, near Highworth, Somersetshire. The Rev Vaughan Thomas, of Oxford, was out with the Vale of White Horse hounds, apparently in good health and spirits, and crossing a field at a foot-pace, when he suddenly fell from his horse and expired. Prompt assistance was immediately rendered, but life was found to be extinct. The rev. gentleman was but recently married.

OPPOSITION TO CALLING OUT THE MILITIA.—A public meeting was held at Birmingham, at the suggestion of the Peace Association, on Tuesday evening, at which resolutions were agreed to deprecating the proposal to call out the militia, and stating that the idea had created both surprise and alarm. The chairman was the Rev. Thomas Morgan, and the leading speakers were Joseph Sturge, Esq., Rev. Thomas Swan Rev. F. Lecree, and the Rev. John Burnet, of London.

THE MIDLAND RAILWAY.—On Monday afternoon the half-yearly meeting of the Midland Railway proprietors was held at the station at Derby. Mr. Hudson, M.P., the Chairman of the Company, presided. The report of the meeting stated that there was a net balance of £197,857 7s. 8d., which enabled the Directors to divide upon each £100 of consolidated stock, £3 13s. 9d.; upon each £100 share of preferential stock, £3 13s. 9d.; upon each £100 of Birmingham and Derby consolidated stock, £3; reserving upwards of £14,000 towards the next half-year's account, leaving an increase over the corresponding half-year's account of 1844, as follows:

Passengers, £47,344; goods, £11,800; minerals, £5785; parcels, £19,104; cattle, £12,627: being a total income for the half year of £103,308. (Cheers.) The Chairman briefly addressed the meeting, and recommended the adoption of the report. He then enumerated the advantages of the amalgamation, and brought forward his scheme of extension. The resolutions for carrying them into effect were agreed to, without opposition

MUSIC.

THE CHORAL HARMONISTS.

The third Meeting was on Monday last, opening with Hummel's Graduale "Quod quod in arbes," which went rather flatly. This was followed by a clever offertorium, "Laudate Dominum," composed by Mr. G. Cooper, the organist, and well sung by Miss Williams. Mozart's magnificent Mass No. 12 closed the first part. The second comprised B. Donato's Madrigal "All ye who music love," (1558), which was encored, a Duet, "The Wood Birds," for soprano, by Julius Stern (who is he?) so prettily warbled by the Misses Williams, that it was demanded a second time; a selection from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," so inadvertently executed that it could never have been rehearsed properly; and Beethoven's Cantata "The Calm of the Sea," which was expressively rendered. The vocalists were the Misses A. and M. Williams, Mr. Lockey (tenor), and Mr. A. Novello (bass). The room was crowded, as usual. The next concert will be on the 16th of February. The materials exist to render this Society of the first class: the programmes are generally admirable, but the want of efficient rehearsals is often severely felt.

MADAME DULCKEN'S SOIREES MUSICALES.

This clever pianist commenced her series of Classical Chamber Concerts on Wednesday night, at her residence, in Harley-street. An elegant assembly was present, in a handsomely-appointed drawing-room, with the best of music, executed by leading instrumentalists. The programme began with Mendelssohn's quartett in E minor, for two violins (Sainton and Goffrie), tenor (Mr. Hill), and violoncello (Mr. Lucas). Then we had Weber's romantic style, in his quatuor, for piano (Madame Dulcken), violin (Blagrove), tenor (Hill), and violoncello (Lucas) and Beethoven's only Pianoforte Sonata, admirably executed by Madame Dulcken, save in the last splendid movement, which was taken too fast, closed the first part. Sterndale Bennett's fanciful Capriccio for pianoforte and orchestra opened the second act. It is an elegant trifle, based on the Mendelssohnian forms, and in the beginning reminded the hearer of the German's ideas in the March of the "Midsummer Night's Dream." Beethoven's Sonata in C minor, exquisitely played by Sivori and Madame Dulcken, concluded the instrumental treat. Mdlle. Schloss was the only vocalist. She sang cleverly a Prayer, by Conradin Kreutzer, a pretty romance, by Henselt; and Mozart's Non Temer, with Blagrove's violin obligato. She has a fine voice, but rather abuses its power.

MR. C. HORN'S ENTERTAINMENT.

Mr. Charles Horn gave his "Lays and Legends of Normandy," at Crosby Hall, on Wednesday night. The twelve compositions of this deservedly popular composer are, on the whole, equal to anything he has yet given to the world: higher praise cannot be awarded, for to Mr. Horn are we indebted for some of the most popular ballads. The concerted pieces are those we like the least. The trio in C natural is very unpretending, and has nothing striking in its harmonies The glee, "Twas Evening," in E sharp, will be the delight of amateur parties. It is in the modern style, with a solo for two of the voices. It may not be a Webbe or a Calcott in construction; but its harmonies are broad and showy; catching the ear, if not charming it. The quartett in A flat, "The Passing Bell," is not at all out of the region of common-place. The Fairy Duet, "Merrily Drip," is a light, lively, and pleasing one for lady voices. It is deliciously sung by the Misses Williams, and is destined to become a rival to the most popular duo. "I Know a Bank," by the same talented Mr. Melville's song, "The Wandering Jew," in four sharps, resembles an Irish melody. In the canzonet, "The Voices of the Winds," in C natural, is a delightful inspiration, little inferior to "The Mermaid's Cave," or "Come and Be My Love." Mr. Hobbs's song of "Rosabel," in B flat, will be liked by the multitude, despite of its great resemblance to the Welsh air, "Poor Mary Anne." The song of "The Flower Girl," in E major, is a pleasing singable song for a lady voice of limited compass, although the theme suggests reminiscences. The canzonet in D, "Maiden of Normandy," has a graceful melody, and is elegantly treated. The cavatina of "Christine," in E flat, requires a good vocalist, to make it effective. The ballad of "Poor Marie," in E flat, is a sale encore, when sung by Mr. Hobbs, but the melody is trite. The cavatina, in F, "The Wood Nymph," takes higher ground, and has Mr. Horne's best attributes - facility and elegance. We cannot but regret, in conclusion, that such excellent music has not been associated with a more entertaining lecture than the "Lays and Legends of Normancy."

MR. WILSON'S SCOTTISH ENTERTAINMENT.

This popular vocalist gave his Lectures on Scottish Song on Monday and Friday, at Crosby Hall, on Wednesday at Hackney, and the next evening at Greenwich. On Monday his "Nicht wi' Burns" will delight the City amateurs at Crosby Hall. Although many of the old songs are now familiar to his audiences at the West-end of London, they are new to a great portion of the "East-enders." His reception at Crosby Hall has been quite enthusiastic, and he received several encores. His voice is in excellent order, and his tact and taste are, of course, undeniable. A host of imitators have sprung up since he first began, but he maintains his deserved popularity.

CONCERTS.—Mr. Willy, the clever violinist, gave concerts on Monday, at Islington, Tuesday at the Marylebone Institution, Wednesday at Rochester, and on Friday at the Eastern Institution. Mr. Adams's organ performance, at Exeter Hall, took place on Friday—we shall reserve our notice until next week. On Monday next Mr. John Ros commences a new entertainment on "The Madrigal and Glee Writers of England." On Wednesday is Miss Mounsey's fourth Sacred Concert. On Thursday the first meeting of the "Melodists' Club," and Mr. Braham's Concert at the St. James's Theatre. On Friday is the Purcell Club dinner

THE OPERATIC AND CONCERT SEASON.—Mr. Macfarren's new opera of "Don Quixote," with Miss Rainforth, Allen, Wells, and Stretton, stands for next week at Drury-Lane Theatre. Mr. Benedict's opera of "The Crusaders" is in active preparation Miss Romer, Miss Rainforth, and Messrs. Harrison, King, Stretton, Burdini, and Durrant are in the cast. Mr. Balfe has had a flying visit to London, but will shortly return for the season, to bring out his opera—"The Star of Seville"—at Drury-Lane. Mr. Wallace is about to visit Dublin; where, by the way, Miss Kate Flower, the contralto, who has returned from Italy, is causing a sensation in concerts with Mr. Phillips at the Music Hall. Letters from Italy describe the reception of Mr. Travers, an English tenor, who, in Verdi's "Lombardi," at Milanese, in Piedmont, had made a great hit. Miss Hayes, a young Irish lady, is also making way at the Scala; and Mr. Jones, a bass, is acquiring popularity. Miss Dolby, after a brilliant career in Germany, returns to London next month.

CECILIAN SOCIETY. This ancient Society, established in 1785, celebrated its sixteenth anniversary on Friday, at the City of London Literary and Scientific Institution, in Aldersgate-street. The members meet on the second and fourth Thursday in each month, except August, for the performance of vocal and instrumental music from the classical masters, with occasional gleanings from the modern composers. In addition to the amateurs, we remark in their programme that the services of Miss Rainforth, the Misses Williams, Miss Rolle Dickinson, Miss Cubit, Miss Felton; Messrs. Harrison, J. Keach, Lorkier, Turner, Peck, Walker, Berry, Durrant, Cornish, Master Simmonds, J. Parry, &c., are engaged.

A Correspondent has called our attention to an Amateur Society established in the City for eighteen years, who play the Symphonies of the old masters. We accept the polite invitation, and will seize an opportunity of attending such an excellent Association. The City amateurs display much judgment and energy in their support of good music.

MILITIA EXEMPTIONS.

MILITIA EXEMPTIONS.—At several large firms in the City and West-end, where a great number of hands are employed, as in some of the principal linen drapery establishments, mutual combinations have been formed to provide substitutes, should any of them be drawn. It is fully expected that the East India Company's Regiment of Volunteers will be formed, and brought into training, which will exempt all their clerks, servants, and labourers from service in the militia. This regiment, which was the last of the volunteer corps that was disbanded, continued in regular training until 1824.

CENTENARY BIRTH-DAY FESTIVAL OF PESTALOZZI

(From a Correspondent.)

This Festival, to which the attention of the scholastic community, and, indeed of the whole philanthropic world, has for the last eighteen months been continually drawn, was celebrated on Saturday, the 12th inst. The spirit by which the Committee of Management were influenced, will probably best be seen from the following extracts from one of their addresses, published July, 1845.

The 12th of January of the coming year, 1846, reminds the Swiss, and every progressing nation, of a common duty to be discharged towards the venerable name of their Pestalozzi. This obligation the departed had on us by his lifelong beneficent efforts.

John Henry Pestalozzi was born at Zurich, on the 12th of January, 1746, at a time when men of all lands lay low in mental degradation.

(The Address then recites the life and labours of Pestalozzi: How he devoted himself to agriculture, and in 1768, he purchased a neglected estate on the Birrfelde, in Aargau, which he remodelled on an improved system of culture; and, having collected the beggar-children of the district, in 1775, he founded his "Agricultural College for the Poor." In 1781 appeared his never-to-be-forgotten book, "Leonard and Gertrude," and from that time he devoted his whole heart to the instruction of the poor, and the education of the people generally. He next published the plan of an instructive newspaper; and, in 1801, he founded at Burgdorf, a self-supporting Normal School, for the children of rich and poor. After many years of vexatious disappointment

Heart-broken by the world for which he had lived—neglected and misunderstood wrecked it all his efforts for the weal of his brethren—poor as any one of the many mendicants whom he had snatched from misery—nothing remaining to him but his integrity, and his strong faith in his God, and the futurity of his projects—the grey head of eighty years old then returned to his beloved Neuhof, to live there exclusively, as he declared, in his will, on the 16th February, 1827, for the earliest object of his life—the education of the poor. But the pious intention was to be only a legacy to posterity. He died, during a visit, at Brugg, on the 17th February, 1827, and was buried, according to his wish, near the Schoolhouse, at Birr

No headstone, no epitaph, only an aged rosebush, marked his grave during eighteen long years; as if the moral hero of the age had left no relation, no friend, no grateful heart, no fatherland behind him. And still, his country thanks him for the flourishing condition of her education. Germany copies him the former

of her new People's schools; France and England invigorate their public instruction with his spirit; thousands of friends and admirers of his name enjoy in all directions, in noble seminaries and institutions, the fruits of his exertions; states promote the happiness of their people by the foundation of poor-houses after his idea; Europe and America, nay, the whole of the educational world, call him Father Pestalozzi, and, yet, no children has been found to encircle his resting-place with a worthy memorial of their love

In 1833 already, the great council of Aargau resolved upon the foundation of a house of education, in memory of the immortal one, for the neglected children of the poor; the execution of the project was, however, deferred, from pecuniary motives. But the new organization of united schools, with a gift from the state of 150,000f. (not quite £6000) was, in the meantime, laid by the spirit of the age as a sacred offering on his tomb.

But, to save the honoured burial-place of the departed from utter oblivion, the parties interested determined, in the year 1845, to build a new school-house by his grave, and add a suitable monument. * * *

The Committee of the Aargau Agricultural Society called a general assembly from all the Swiss Cantons, without any distinction of religious creed or political opinion, at Brugg, on the 12th and 13th July, again to take the affair in hand, and complete it. The assembled, alive to a feeling of honour and duty, were immediately of accord that—

"Not only shall a new tomb and monument for Pestalozzi be constructed, as near as possible to his first burial-place, but a living, lasting, useful monument, in the spirit of the last Institution he founded, shall be forthwith commenced, and on the celebration of his hundredth birthday, be set into operation. It shall consist of an Agricultural Institution for the education of the poor; and in it, according to Pestalozzian principles, instructors and instructresses shall be trained for other and similar poor-schools. The Institution shall be established on the former Pestalozzian estate, Neuhoff on the Birrfelds, in the Canton of Aargau."

* * * Provided the funds of the Institution permit any extension of the present plan, an Asylum for neglected children shall be formed, to serve as a kind of Model House of Correction for the young. * * * The Institution is a Swiss one, into which pupils from all the Cantons may be admitted. And children from foreign countries shall not be debarred admission to the extent the funds of the Institution will allow. * * *

This stirring appeal has not been made in vain. During the past six months, upwards of 35,000 Swiss francs (rather more than £2600) have been collected, in Switzerland and elsewhere, and placed at the disposition of the Committee. The present proprietor of Neuhoff, Mr. Jäger, a relative of Pestalozzi, will not part with the estate under 90,000 francs, and even then he makes a considerable sacrifice. The money already in hand will be as advantageously employed as possible, and kept accumulating; while new subscriptions will be solicited in all parts of the world, until the required sum be obtained, and the object proposed accomplished.

The Government of Aargau has in the meantime acted very liberally, and shown itself every way worthy of being the guardian of Pestalozzi's reputation and remains. It has wholly borne the expenses of the national fête and monument, and has granted to the Committee, at a mere nominal rent, the use of the Castle of Olsberg, and nearly sixty acres of land, until Neuhoff can be purchased.

But this is anticipating. A programme of the solemnity had been sent us on New Year's Day, and, in common with many others in our neighbourhood, we repaired to Birr on the 12th. Birr is itself but a little hamlet, yet its situation is sufficiently romantic and beautiful to obtain for it the notice of most tourists—most pedestrians, at any rate. It lies at the foot of part of the Jura Chain, and is overlooked by the Castles of Brunneck, Wildeck, and Habsburg, all three noted in Swiss annals: the chief attraction of the place will be, however, in the future, its association with the labours and the final resting-place of Pestalozzi.

Never, probably, since the times of the haughty feudal chiefs and their subservient clans, has such a gathering been seen in this retired spot. And the multitudes assembling were met for no high and holy a purpose!

The ceremonies were to have commenced at ten o'clock, but the continued arrival of honoured guests delayed the opening of the church doors until nearly eleven.

At nine already, the surviving members of Pestalozzi's family had met at Neuhoff, to receive the different deputations; strangers to that thronged to the place. The house in which Mr. Jäger lives is not the one formerly occupied by Pestalozzi, though this is still standing behind. Mr. Jäger is only distantly related to the Pestalozzi family by marriage: a granddaughter of Pestalozzi, however, a venerable old lady, was in the room, and a great-grandnephew, a young but already promising engineer.

A few short addresses were made here by one or two members of the Council, and the four children with whom the New School is to be begun, were formally delivered over to the care of the teacher, M. Sandmeyer. He seems to be a modest but worthy man. He was, if we are rightly informed, a pupil of Pestalozzi; subsequently, of Fellenberg; and, lastly, of Wehrli. He has lately visited all the celebrated agricultural schools (at the desire and expense of the Aargau Government) in Switzerland and the countries immediately adjoining. He will commence his task forthwith at Olsberg. The children are Protestants, but arrangements are being made for the admission of Catholics.

At eleven, the procession moved from Neuhoff to Birr Church, distant, probably, about 500 yards. As it came up, headed by all the chief men of the canton, and attended by the Landamman's officers with their staves, every head was bared. The family of Pestalozzi were not loudly greeted; they were rather lowly revered.

The Church was nothing like large enough for the occasion, and too many singers had been admitted. The Committee had been anxious to have an effective choir, and, at the same time, to give the poorest of the place an opportunity of raising their voices for the last time around their old instructor. As might be expected, nearly the whole of Pestalozzi's old pupils, living anywhere near, had made it a point of honour to be present. They formed a curious group, of all ages and ranks almost. One old, very old, man was conspicuous. He was pointed out as having been the very first of Pestalozzi's pupils. He was between eighty and ninety; his hair white as the snows in the churchyard, still he seemed hale, and took a lively interest in all that went forward.

At the far end of the Church, before the pulpit, was placed the body. It had been found in a state of excellent preservation. The original coffin was so little injured, that it had only been taken out of the ground as it was, and placed in a new shell of plain black wood. A pall covered the coffin, and wreaths of evergreen lay upon it. Behind the coffin stood the teacher of the new School and his four pupils, and, in the rear of them, the surviving relatives of the family.

After the singing of a hymn, the Minister of Birr offered up a prayer, and the coffin was carried by eight teachers into the churchyard, and laid before the Monument. Of course all followed

The New-School of Birr—a poor school, built and endowed by the Government of Aargau—has been raised over the old grave of Pestalozzi. The edifice is not very large, but, still, respectably so; and one end of it entirely is devoted to the Monument.

It is not yet entirely finished, but enough is done to give a just idea of the whole. It is simple, but very elegant. We remember to have seen few Monuments, the conception and execution of which pleased us better. The inscription, too, is good:

All for others—for himself nothing.

'As the body was lowered into the vault, under the steps of the Monument, the different bands of singers burst out into a piece of exquisite melody composed for the occasion. The effect was striking. The sun had now pierced the mountain mists, and shone brightly. The air was clear, though cold. Despite the severity of the season, every one present remained uncovered until the ceremony was completed. Numbers of spectators climbed up to the church windows; some even were perched in the belfry, at the risk of their lives: no place commanding a view of the proceedings was left unfilled.

The body having been lowered, the vault was encircled with garlands of evergreen; the bust of the venerable philanthropist was brought, and placed beside, the temples twined with laurel. Five-and-twenty copies of "Lienhard and Gertrude" were laid on a table near, and then two or three very eloquent addresses were delivered from the Monument steps, immediately before the vault, by the Rev. Amsler (Protestant), School Inspector, the Rev. Vögeli (Catholic), and from the Landammann Welland. The latter presented to the School Inspector, in the name of the Government, the books before spoken of, to be distributed to deserving scholars of the Canton poor schools, in the course of the following year, and also to be placed in such school libraries. To the Teacher of the new Pestalozzian School, he gave the bust, adding appropriate remarks.

PESTALOZZI.

Choral hymns were again sung; and, at about three o'clock, the assembly dispersed.

All the official bodies, and most strangers of note, received dinner tickets from the Government Committee. At a few minutes after four, upwards of 300 sat down to dine at the Maison Rouge, at Brugg. A few toasts and sentiments were given; but the meeting was rather characterised by harmony, than by brilliancy or festivity.

Among those who were present, and who had contributed much to the success of the measures taken, the venerable Zschokke should not be overlooked. His presence did honour to the cause and the country. He was for many years the personal and intimate friend of Pestalozzi, and is scarcely less deserving of public regard. After having been for half a century the people's guide and oracle, he devotes the close of his existence to caring for the welfare of the people's children, and those of the lowest and least befriended classes. How much he is beloved by the Swiss people is easy to see; how much reason they have to love him will be better seen by future generations than by ourselves. He left the room at an early hour, to return to Aargau, where he resides; and soon after his departure, the assembly broke up, each one retiring to his inn, or his home, pondering upon the singular dispensations of Providence, as manifested in the life and fate of

FATHER PESTALOZZI!

P.S.—At Burgdorf, at Solothurn, and at other places, festivals have, also, been held in honour of Pestalozzi.

THE VIADUCT OF BARENTIN, ON THE ROUEN AND HAVRE RAILWAY.

In our Journal of last week, we described the fall of this stupendous work. We annex a View, previous to the catastrophe, and quote a few of the details of the vast structure.

The Viaduct was commenced in the spring of 1844, since which time between 200 and 300 workmen had been daily employed upon it. It was not quite completed at the time of its destruction. It was composed of 27 brick arches, each presenting a span of 15 metres, and supported by 28 pillars, likewise of brick, each of which was four metres thick. The greatest elevation was 32 metres. The entire length of the work was 500 metres. All that now remains of this gigantic construction is the bases of the pillars, and even those are much shaken. The loss is estimated at 1,200,000f.

THE GREAT VIADUCT OF BARENTIN, ON THE ROUEN AND HAVRE RAILWAY.

PHYSICIAN TO THE EMPEROR OF MOROCCO.

The Physician of the Emperor of Morocco, who is at present in England, supplying himself with European medicines, has, through the kind offices of a Correspondent, supplied us with some interesting information respecting Morocco and its Emperor, which we hasten to communicate to our readers. The Physician, who is about 50 years of age, is a man of much intelligence, and is well acquainted with the resources of European science; having cultivated the friendship of all the distinguished Europeans who visited Barbary, and from whom he has received information touching new discoveries and improvements. On many occasions he has saved the lives of shipwrecked Europeans, who would otherwise have been put to death by the fanatic Moors; and, to his friendly offices, most of the European travellers in the empire of Morocco stand indebted. The information he gives respecting some of the remedial resources of Africa are full of interest, and contains facts, which, if widely promulgated, would have an important influence on medical science. Some of his most effectual remedies he has derived from the Philistines of Mount Atlas, and the roving tribes of Sahara; and, in certain maladies, the mode of treatment prescribed by them is successful when the European methods fail. This, however, will cease to excite astonishment, when

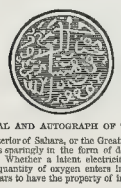
It is remembered that the most precious European medicines of the present day have been derived from the information given by savages. The Virginian Snake-root, the Peruvian Bark, and many others which could be mentioned, come under this category; while a large proportion of the rest have been originally secret medicines, among which may be mentioned James's Fever Powder, Iodine, Colchicum, Griffith's Mixture, and many others.



SEAL AND AUTOGRAPH OF THE EMPEROR OF MOROCCO.

In the interior of Sahara, or the Great Desert, is a magnetic rock, from which a water distils sparingly in the form of dew, which is possessed of extraordinary properties. Whether a latent electricity be imparted by the magnetism, or an additional quantity of oxygen enters into its composition, it is not easy to say; but, it appears to have the property of increasing the vital energies, as it restores the colour of grey hair, apparently by renewing the circulation in its capillary tubes, the cessation of which occasions greyness, and it gives the appearances of youth to persons of considerable antiquity. This water is brought to Morocco on swift dromedaries for the use of the Court, and its powers are much extolled by the Physician; it might be called the antipodes of the Lethean Styx of ancient times; and, though its virtues are certainly inexplicable by the lights of modern science, they cannot be denied in the face of sufficient credentials. In the caravans which cross the Desert of Sahara, the water, which is carried in skins, is sometimes all dried up suddenly by the hot winds; but, to this medicinal water, such an accident has never happened.

Muley Abderulman, the present Emperor of Morocco, has occupied the throne more than twenty years, and succeeded his uncle, Muley Soliman, who left the throne to his nephew, in preference to any of his own thirty-six sons. Muley Abderahman is one of the best Emperors that Morocco has known for many years. The recognised practice of the country, and, indeed, the method by which much of the revenue has heretofore been raised, is to set Pashas over particular districts, to plunder the people by every imaginable exaction; and then for the Emperor to plunder the Pashas so soon as they have gorged themselves sufficiently. The present Emperor has discouraged this practice; it has been but a rare event with him to "catch" either a Pasha or other subject, and then they have generally been culpable of some flagrant misdemeanour. Muley Abderahman, notwithstanding the loss of this source of income, is rich; as he practises the most rigid economy; he is in the habit of lending money to the native merchants to carry on their operations; and he suffers most of them to be indebted to the Customs department in considerable sums, with the view of giving them further accommodation. The Emperor is a most religious man; he is a diligent peruser of the Koran, and he bows with humility to the Divine will in every dispensation.

The late Emperor, Muley Soliman, was also a man of much worth, though not held in the same high reverence as the present Emperor. A few years before his decease, Muley Soliman went to war with some of the Philistine tribes of Mount Atlas, and was defeated by them: eventually, however, he defeated those tribes, drove them from their country, and cursed them; which, the Emperor being at the head of the church, is equivalent to excommunication. The Moors, wherever they appeared, in consequence of the curse of the Emperor, refused to give them the slightest relief, and thousands of these people perished with famine. Some of them came as far as Tangier, where the Physician was at this time; and he relates that he has seen them fight for a dead rat in the market-place; and every day many of them died in the streets. Going one day into one of the gardens outside the town, he found a number of bones of persons who had recently died; among them sat a woman, leaning against a wall, with an infant at her breast. The woman had just died, and the child was attempting to suck its dead mother. He took the child in his arms; it opened its mouth spasmodically a few times, and then died too!

Throughout Morocco there is not a single wheeled vehicle of any description; there is not a road on which a wheeled carriage could travel, and there are no bridges; so that travelling is impossible in the rainy season, when many persons lose their lives in their attempts to cross rivers.

The Physician relates that, on one occasion, he was carried down in attempting to cross a river, near Fez, but was caught by a tree entangled in the bed of the river, on which he continued three days and three nights, before the flood had sufficiently abated to enable him to be rescued. During this time, large trees, which had been torn up by the roots, were frequently carried past him by the water; and he was in perpetual apprehension of some of these trees carrying off the tree by which he was sustained. Towns, during the winter months, have to lay in a stock of provisions, as if they were about to undergo a siege. Meat is preserved, for winter consumption, not by salting, but by boiling it in oil.

The Schilluch, and other tribes of Mount Atlas, say that they are the Philistines who were driven out of Palestine by David, and there is every probability that their story is a true one. These tribes are nearly pure savages; they go almost naked among the frost and snow of Atlas, and dwell in caves or in woods. The higher peaks of Mount Atlas are constantly covered with snow, and the rivers rising in those parts are kept full in summer, by the melting of the snows by the heat. The land, wherever there is water, is very fertile; but, where water is scarce, it is a desert. The Physician states that, on one occasion, when travelling into Sahara, he took the precaution to enclose the water-skins, carried on the camels, in boxes, filling the space between the skin and the box with earth. The hot wind came, however, and dried up all the water in the skins, in spite of this precaution; and the skins themselves were made so brittle, that they might be broken or crumbled in the hand. Some of his retinue died, and he immediately turned back, and with difficulty reached the wells, from whence he had set out in the morning.

The French are supposed to have long coveted Morocco, but they would find more trouble in making themselves masters of it than they have experienced in Algiers. The Emperor, even if defeated, could retreat to Tafilet, or, if necessary, to Fasi, whither the French could not follow him, as, their water supplies being cut off, they would perish in the desert. From the inaccessible heights of Atlas tribes would be in perpetual readiness to sally forth and fall upon the invader when unprepared; so, though the French might succeed in retaining possession of some of the towns or fortified places, they would find the retention of the country to be impossible. The whole Moslem population are deeply exasperated against the French, for their conduct in Algiers; and, it would be a war of extermination that must be waged, if war were waged at all. The French have already felt the weight of such a warfare, and they would be overwhelmed altogether if Morocco were added to the load.

We should add, that the Physician was the medical attendant of the late as well as of the present Emperor: we assure his portrait, which, though in opposition to the prejudices of the country, we have been enabled to obtain. Appended, also, are the Royal Seal and Autograph of Muley Abdarahman, the present Emperor.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE SOUTH-EASTERN RAILWAY.

On Tuesday morning an accident of an appalling character happened between Tunbridge and Penshurst stations, on the South-Eastern Railway, by the falling of a bridge over a branch of the river Medway, when an engine and portion of a train were precipitated into the stream, the engine-driver killed, and property of considerable value destroyed.

The disaster occurred between twelve and one o'clock in the morning, the bridge being a kind of wooden viaduct, resting on brickwork abutments. For some days past the channel has been greatly swollen by the recent rains and wind, overflowing its banks, and inundating the fields and meadows for a considerable distance. The torrent of water, through the different culverts and bridges on the line, is described to have been exceedingly great, more especially at the one that led to the catastrophe.

The ordinary night up goods-train left Tunbridge shortly after twelve o'clock on Monday night, its usual time, and, on reaching the bridge in question, the guards were considerably alarmed on hearing a loud crash, and immediately they perceived a huge outburst of steam and heated coke, the train receiving at the same moment a severe shock, which instantaneously stopped it. For some minutes it was scarcely possible to conjecture what had taken place; but, on the confusion and excitement somewhat subsiding, it was found that the bridge had given way at the moment the engine went on, not only precipitating the engine and tender into the stream, but also several of the luggage-vans. Of the engine, just the top of the chimney could be discerned, while the tender and carriages were immersed in the water

The attention of the guards was instantly directed to the safety of the engine-driver and stoker, brothers, named William and George Doyle, who were both found lying on the banks of the river. The stoker had managed to swim ashore, dragging the frightfully-injured engine-driver with him. The poor fellow was almost cut in two, and it was with much surprise that he was discovered to be breathing. It seems that finding the bridge parting and the engine falling into the water, he must have endeavoured to jump off, when he fell between the engine and tender, and, the ends striking, nearly severed him at the lower part of the stomach. The sufferers were with all possible haste conveyed to Tunbridge, but when that place was reached, the unfortunate engine-driver had ceased to exist

On Wednesday afternoon Mr. Dudlow, one of the Coroners for the county of Kent, opened an investigation at the Angel Inn, Tunbridge, relative to the death of Charles Dolby, aged 27, the engine-driver, who lost his life by this deplorable accident

Charles Leonard, a guard in the service of the Company, gave evidence confirmatory of the above account, but said he could not form any opinion as to the cause of the accident.

The Coroner here asked the condition of the stoker, the deceased's brother, who was lying at the house

Mr. Gorman, a surgeon who had charge of him, replied that he did not think him sufficiently recovered to undergo the excitement which an examination might produce.

In consequence, therefore, of the dangerous state of the brother of the deceased, it was determined for the present not to examine him.

After the examination of another witness, Mr P. W. Barlow, the company's engineer, was called to give information as to the cause of the falling of the bridge. He had carefully examined the spot since the accident, but in consequence of the foundation and the lower part of the arch being so much inundated with the water, he had been unable to make such inspection as to arrive precisely at the cause of the unfortunate occurrence, nor could he until the water subsided. As he stated, however, that he could then give a decided opinion upon the subject, the inquest was adjourned till Monday next.

"THE BIRKENHEAD" IRON STEAM-FRIGATE.

This fine steam-frigate has recently been built by Mr. John Laird, at his shipyard, at North Birkenhead; and was launched towards the close of last month, the Marchioness of Westminster performing the ceremony.

The Birkenhead will be one of the largest iron steamers belonging to the Government. The following are her dimensions:—

Length between perpendiculars	..	..	210 feet
Breadth, within paddle-wheels	..	..	37½ feet
Ditto outside ditto, about	..	..	60½ feet
Depth of Hold	..	..	23 feet
Tonnage, carpenters' measurement	..	..	1490 tons.

She is to be propelled by paddle-wheels; and the engines, by Messrs. George Forrester and Co., will be, collectively, of 560 horse power. The model was by Mr. Laird himself, and approved of by the Admiralty. She is, in fact, all that can be desired by the most critical judges in naval architecture; very sharp at both extremities, yet with that fulness and rotundity of bottom and bearings which will enable her to do her work well, "blow high, or blow low"

She has a round but handsome stern, with few but chaste decorations; and her bow terminates in a huge figure of Vulcan, who holds a hammer in his hands, and in the other some of "the bolts of Jove," which he has just "forged." This was designed and executed by Mr. Robertson, of Liverpool. The vessel is clincher-built below water, and carvel built below her top sides

The armament of the Birkenhead will, we learn, be two 96 pound pivot guns, one forward and the other aft; and four 68-pounder broadside guns. The round stern is peculiarly adapted for the working of the huge "Long Tom" aft; and when, to the artillery stated, we add the men and musketry she will carry, and the power of her steam to place her in any position, offensive or defensive, there can be no doubt but she will prove to be a most formidable opponent to any adversary

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 24, 1846.

NOTWITHSTANDING the great diminution in the number of Railway schemes that has taken place, from the operation of various causes needless here to specify, enough still remain to task all the energy that the Legislature will have to spare, after the important public business that must occupy so much of its attention. But it is to be hoped that all the anxiety of Parliament will not be absorbed by the new schemes; there is no little need for some improvement in the manner in which the old ones are managed. Accidents are even more frequent now, after some years' experience of the working of the system, than they were in its infancy. We are falling off in skill at the time we ought, in the natural course of things, to be nearer perfection. Whether this proceeds from the desire of Companies to make larger profits, by reducing the expenditure to a degree that ensures a saving to themselves more certainly than it procures safety to the public,—or from the carelessness of numerous and well-paid officials, who ought to be better disciplined,—or, lastly, from some of the lines having in the course of years got somewhat out of order, the inevitable wear and tear having escaped due attention,—it matters not: in either case the travelling public is placed in "jeopardy every hour," and a feeling of dissatisfaction and mistrust is growing up, the deeper because the community has no direct power of applying the remedy. They are completely in the hands of the Companies, who are supposed, for the amount of the fares, to provide all the precautions that are foresight required to make travelling safe. But from what is perpetually occurring, an impression is daily extending that less of those necessary qualities are exhibited than is desirable. If an accident takes place, down posts General Pasley, looks at the torn up rails and broken engine, rides back, trying an experiment or two by the way, gives his evidence before the Coroner's Jury, and explains elaborately what every body knew—how the calamity took place, but has little to say about what all are most anxious to hear—how such accidents can be prevented for the future. Thus the gallant General says, in a letter written to explain some inaccuracies that appeared in the reports of his evidence at the inqest at Thetford:—

I ascribed the accident partly to the imprudence of the engineman in running down a long descending gradient of 1 in 200 at the utmost speed that his engine could command, and partly to the peculiar construction of that engine, which I considered unsafe at a speed exceeding 45 miles an hour; a speed that was perfectly unnecessary on any part of that line, but especially on that portion of it where the accident occurred, between Harlingtrad station and Thetford, a distance of only eight miles, for travelling over which forty-six minutes were allowed.

We have no doubt the cause of the accident was exactly what it is here stated to have been; but what the public want is some measures that shall effectually prevent such recklessness for the future. From all these inquests, inquiries, investigations, and reports, nothing seems to arise of any actual advantage. A man or two is killed, some passengers crushed, the fears of the public excited, the newspapers for a day or so are full of the affair, and then all sinks back again to its former apathy. Accidents from overdriving in general, all collisions, and the mishaps arising from bungling and confused management, are clearly to be traced to the Company itself, either through its bad instructions, or inefficient or careless servants. It is here that amendment is wanted, and the power to enforce such amendments must be created, if, by oversight, it does not now exist. All the long reports of General Pasley will never bring us a step nearer the desired improvement unless the valuable suggestions they doubtless often contain, are followed up by action. What is the use of knowing the better mode, if we still pursue the worse, or allow others to pursue it?

For the safety of life and property, the Railroads must still be the "Queen's Highway," though the profits of the traffic go into private pockets. Railway, like all other property, must learn that it has "its duties as well as its rights"—and one of the chief of those duties is, to ensure to the public that safety which it amply pays for. This is perfectly attainable. The best lines in the kingdom are exempt from that painful notoriety which is beginning to attach to others; those others must look to it, for a regard for profits must not absorb the energies of the Railway King, here is a fine field for him, in which he may win opinions even better than the "golden" ones he now enjoys; but it is time he set to work, and exhibited his ability in improving the practical operation of the system he has done so much to develop. We would rather dispense with a few hundred miles of Railroad for a year or two, than go on in terror of being crushed by mismanagement on those which already exist. Let the Hercules of the Age of Iron begin the task, and that forthwith; for unless he shows his strength by results, men will begin to doubt its existence. When they have neglected their duty to the community, even greater Monarchs than the "Railway King" have been obliged to abdicate.

But whoever may do it, or decline to do it, better regulations must be enforced; the Government must have a control over the management of these immense undertakings, and that a direct and positive one. The system of inspection must be more rigid and more extensive; such an immense system cannot longer be entrusted to the mere department of the Board of Trade; it has outgrown such supervision; it has ceased to be a thing of subordinate importance, and will soon require a Board of its own.

Nor is safety of the person the only thing required; late revelations have sorely shaken the confidence of the public in the honesty of many of the railroad employées, and, unfortunately, it is not confined to one line or two. A remarkable document has just appeared, in which we would advise Boards of Directors to publish an answer, stating what measures, if any, have been taken to purge their establishments of those implicated. We allude to the confession of the convict Garratt, dated from "the Baretta transport," one of the most startling things the press has lately given to the world. He, it seems, was "living in idleness" near a railway station, and used to go on the platform to see the trains arrive; here he "got into conversation with the people of the railway and joined a connexion," so that the confederacy of railway brigandage must have been in existence before he became a member of it. Then follow such statements as this:—

We found it best to work at dark. Sometimes a passenger would be watched, and if any parcel of his promised well he would be dodged through to the train, and, when it had passed on, with the confederate we managed matters easily; for, where practicable, he would put the luggage in the wrong place, or with a wrong ticket on it, or boldly give it to a confederate as his luggage to go with him in a carriage, instead of in the luggage van; a confederate would ride a short or long trip, and then claim the particular article, or walk away with it, with or without the connivance of the guard, depending on his being in the secret or not. It was by going as a short passenger that we were able to effect these things; or else would, on the arrival of the train, boldly seize anything, and if stopped, it could be attributed to mistake.

Throughout, the staff of the Railway is implicated, but it was at the "Junction lines,"

That we were able to work as well without the assistance of the railway man as with it. The passengers were gone out into the refreshment-rooms, and there was another by which we could start off to another place. In these various ways the game was played; first one way, then another, and, as one line then changed about to another, intending to change from line to line in succession.

The impunity with which this system was carried on is astonishing; the details of the particular robbery which brought some of the parties to justice, equal in audacity of crime anything in the career of Jonathan Wild. The restoration of the property was regularly "negotiated" as a matter of business, the robberies going on all the while; and it is almost impossible, when the case afterwards appears, to believe that the police have not neglected their duty; if not, they were miserably inefficient; how else can such proceedings as this be accounted for?—

When the discovery of other matters was made, and I was "wanted," as I thought, but not known, I resolved to leave England, and began quietly to realise; but then came the squabbles between the agents of the companies, and their disapproval of what had been done against Maynard, and stoppage of any other investigations; that gave me confidence, and I determined to remain, but forsook my lodging and old pals, and traded by myself on several lines, even under the very eyes of the police who wanted me, yet did not know me, except as a gentleman's servant, and above suspicion, whilst I have spent hours in their company, and sent spies to volunteer information and assistance. I felt certain all further pursuit was cooled down and stopped, and went on for weeks at the old game; we also resorted to various expedients to put them on wrong scents, and deter them from pursuit, if they were intent on it.

There is something rich in the use of the word "traded" here; and the perfect innocence of the police, as to what was going on "under their very eyes," is also edifying. But, what a rottenness does it not reveal in the whole system? What a contrast to the perfect safety to property which exists on the Continental lines! and their regulations must be adopted here, with better selected men to carry them out.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

RETURN OF THE QUEEN AND PRINCE ALBERT TO BUCKINGHAM PALACE.

The Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Princess of Wales and the Princess Royal, arrived at Buckingham Palace, at ten minutes past three o'clock on Wednesday afternoon, from Windsor. Prince Alfred and the Princess Alice were in another carriage and four, accompanied by the Dowager Lady Lyttelton.

Her Majesty and her Royal Consort were received at the Palace by the Lord Chamberlain, the Master of the Horse, the Marquis of Granby, and Capt. Francis Seymour.

The Queen held a Privy Council at half-past three o'clock.

The Queen in Council was pleased to declare the Most Noble Walter Duke of Buccleuch, Lord President of her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, and his Grace took his place at the Board accordingly

Her Majesty having been pleased to deliver the custody of the Privy Seal to the Right Hon. Thomas Earl of Haddington, the oath of Keeper of the Privy Seal was administered to him, and the Noble Earl took his place at the Board.

The Queen having been pleased to appoint the Right Hon. Henry Earl of Harewood to be Lord Lieutenant of the West Riding of Yorkshire, his Lordship took the appointed oaths.

Her Majesty having been pleased to appoint the Right Hon. James Earl of Verulam to be Lord Lieutenant of Hertfordshire, the Noble Earl took the oaths appointed to be taken thereupon.

The Queen's Speech, on opening the session of Parliament, was arranged and agreed upon.

CHAPTER OF THE MOST NOBLE ORDER OF THE GARTER.

On Monday her Majesty held a Chapter of the Most Noble Order of the Garter at Windsor. The Knights Companions having been robed in the armoury in the tunnels and cellars, passed into St. George's Hall, where they were ranged over by Garter King of Arms. The Knights Companions present were his Royal Highness Prince Albert, his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, his Royal Highness Prince George, the Duke of Rutland, Duke of Wellington, Marquis of Exeter, Duke of Richmond, Duke of Buccleuch, Marquis of Lansdowne, Duke of Beaufort, Duke of Cleveland, Marquis of Abercorn, Earl Talbot, and the Earl of Powis

The officers of the Order attended in their mantles, chains, and badges. There were present the Prelate, the Bishop of Winchester; the Chancellor, the Bishop of Oxford; the Secretary, the Hon. and Very Rev. Spencer Perceval; Garter, Principal King of Arms, Sir Charles Young; and Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, Sir Augustus W. J. Clifford, Bart.

The Queen and Prince Albert were conducted from the private apartments to the Garter Room by the Lord Steward, the Lord Chamberlain, the Master of the Horse, the Vice-Chamberlain, the Treasurer of the Household, and the Comptroller of the Household.

Her Majesty being seated on a Chair of State, the Knights, attended by the officers of the Order, proceeded into the presence of the Sovereign; the Chancellor remaining at the door, not having been sworn.

The Knights Companions being seated, the Registrar signified to the Sovereign that the Right Rev. Dr. Samuel Wilberforce, Lord Bishop of Oxford, attended at the door of the Chapter Room, and humbly prayed to be admitted to take the oath of office as Chancellor of the Most Noble Order; wherenpon, by her Majesty's command, the Chancellor, wearing his mantle of purple velvet over his episcopal habit, was introduced between Garter and Black Rod, the former carrying on a velvet cushion the purse, gold chain and badge. The Chancellor knelt on the left hand of the Sovereign, and the oath was administered to him by the Re[illegible]trar. His Lordship was then invested by the Queen with the gold chain and badge, and having received from her Majesty the purse, had the honour to kiss hands, and retired to his place on the left hand of the Sovereign.

The Marquis of Camden and the Earl of Haddington were then invested by her Majesty with the Order of the Garter, with the accustomed ceremonies.

The Queen wore the mantle and collar of the Order at the investiture; the prelate stood on the right of the Queen, the Chancellor on the left, the other officers of the Order remaining at the bottom of the table. The Duchess of Buccleuch, Mistress of the Robes, and the Viscountess Jocelyn, Lady in Waiting, were behind her Majesty on the left, and the Lord Chamberlain, with the Sword of State, on the opposite side. The officers of the Royal Household in Waiting occupied their usual stations.

Sir Robert Peel and Sir James Graham were present at the august ceremony.

The Queen gave a grand dinner in the evening, to which all the Knights of the Order of the Garter present at the Chapter were honoured with invitations, and were present, with the exceptions of his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge (who left the Castle in the afternoon for Kew), and of the Marquis of Anglesey, who was prevented, by indisposition, from being present, and who also took his departure from the Castle in the afternoon.

The band of the Grenadier Guards was in attendance in one of the galleries during dinner, and performed several favourite pieces.

At the Court which was held, Earl Grey had the audience of her Majesty, and delivered the ensigns of the Order of the Garter worn by his late father.

PARLIAMENTARY ENTERTAINMENTS.

On Wednesday evening the Duke of Wellington, as the Ministerial leader in the House of Lords, gave his customary Parliamentary banquet, at Apsley House, to the supporters of the Government. Above forty Peers assembled at the banquet. As usual, immediately the dinner had finished, the Duke of Wellington read her Majesty's Speech. It was after ten o'clock when the circle separated. The company were in full dress.

Sir Robert Peel, as First Lord of the Treasury, gave a grand full dress banquet on the same evening, at the Right Hon. Baronet's private mansion, in Whitehall Gardens. The entertainment was served up in a style of consummate elegance in the noble picture gallery. About two hundred members of the House of Commons were present; and Sir R. Peel also read the Queen's Speech, immediately after dinner.

Lord John Russell entertained a party of twenty, at dinner, on Wednesday evening, at his Lordship's family residence, in Chesham-place, comprising the noble Lord's leading political friends in the House of Commons.

WINDSOR, Thursday evening.—(From our own Correspondent)—The Duchess of Kent left Frogmore House this morning in a close travelling carriage and four, for town, for the purpose of being present, in the House of Lords, upon the opening of the Session of Parliament by her Majesty. Her Royal Highness, who was attended by Lady Fanny Howard, returned to Frogmore to dinner. Her Royal Highness will not take her departure for Clarence House, St. James's, for the season, until Tuesday, the 10th proximo; the day before her Majesty holds her first levee this year, at St. James's Palace. Her Majesty is expected to leave Buckingham Palace, in the course of a few days, for Claremont; and shortly afterwards, it is contemplated, the Court will proceed to Osborne House, for a short sojourn in the Isle of Wight, preparatory to a brief visit to Windsor Castle.

ILLNESS OF THE DUKE OF SUTHERLAND. The Duke of Sutherland is suffering from what is professionally called remadiament of the brain—one of the most intractable in medical skill, of all the ills that flesh is heir to.

THE EARL OF ESSEX. We regret to hear that the Earl of Essex, in consequence of the present uncertain state of his health, has been forced to decline the offer tendered to him by Sir Robert Peel of the Lord Lieutenancy of the county of Hertford, vacant by the demise of the Earl of Verulam.

DEPARTURE OF THE COURT FOR THE ISLE OF WIGHT.—We understand the Court is not expected to leave Buckingham Palace for the Isle of Wight until the first week in February.

THE PRINCE OF CAPUA AND FAMILY.—This illustrious individual, accompanied by her Royal Highness the Princess and their Royal Highnesses the Prince Francesco di Borbone and the Princess Vittoria Augusta di Borbone, their infant children, arrived at Malta on New Year's-day, in her Majesty's steam-packet Sydenham, from Marseilles; and, on their landing, the Hibernia, bearing the flag of Vice-Admiral Sir William Parker, fired a Royal salute. At a ball given by his Excellency Sir William Parker, the naval commander-in-chief, both their Royal Highnesses honoured him with their presence.

The Dean, it is said, being anxious to protect the young men of the College from Romanising influences, called on Mr. Morris to sign the 39 articles, which Mr. Morris said he had lately done in the sense of Tract No. 90. Hence the deprivation alluded to.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

MEETING OF THE CITY OF WESTMINSTER AGAINST THE CORN-LAWS.—On Tuesday evening a numerous meeting of the inhabitants of the City of Westminster was held in the Crown and Anchor Tavern, for the purpose of taking into consideration the propriety of petitioning the Legislature for a total and immediate repeal of the Corn-laws. Every part of the great room was filled, and amongst the persons on the platform were Mr. M. Gibson, M.P., Dr. Bowring, M.P., Sir C. Napier, M.P., the Hon. E. Bouverie, M.P., Mr. Thornely, M.P., Sir Lacy Evans, &c. Resolutions against the Corn-laws were carried. Sir C. Napier M.P., in the course of his address analysed (amidst the laughter of the meeting) the speeches of the Dukes of Norfolk and Rutland, and a letter to the Queen of Chichester by Lord March, whom he styled "the son of the Protector-General." His was said to see that the agricultural labourers had at last found out that they were not so well off as they ought to be, and he hoped the example set at Goadcaster would spread.

IMPORTANT FREE-TRADE MEETING IN MARYLEBONE.—On Tuesday evening an immense assemblage of the inhabitants of Marylebone was held at the Mechanics' School, Albany-street, Regent's-park, for the purpose of allowing them to express their opinions on the Corn-laws at the present crisis. Upwards of 5000 persons were present, including the leading gentlemen of the locality. The chair was filled by Joseph Hume, Esq., M.P., who stated that 34 years' experience of public events had confirmed him in his opinion of the impolicy of commercial restrictions. Professor Keye moved the first resolution—"That this meeting enters the solemn protest against the Corn-laws, and urges their total, immediate, and unconditional repeal." Mr. R. Moore was addressed the meeting for some time. He remarked that the perseverance of the Anti-Corn-law League would not allow them to be crowned with success. Sir R. Peel had now repudiated protection. Mr. Moore then said the allegations made by the Protectionists were absurd; they were charges without an attempt at proof. In his opinion, the farmer was not so anxious as the manufacturer to be left, for subsistence, to the fair exercise of, and return for his own capital and industry employed. In reference to the League, Mr. Moore said that unless it had been honest, it would not have gained the votes and the respect of the people of England. The resolution was agreed to, and also one of thanks to the League, for their attention to the registration of electors, and of congratulation on the progress of the 40s. freehold movement.

REPEAL OF THE WINDOW DUTIES.—Last Saturday evening a very numerous meeting of the delegates from the various metropolitan parishes, appointed last year, took place at the Court-house, Marylebone, at which a memorial to Sir R. Peel was unanimously agreed to, urging the expediency of including a total repeal of the window duties in the financial scheme of the year.

GRAND DINNER AT THE MANSION HOUSE.—The Lord Mayor and the Lady Mayoress gave a splendid entertainment on Tuesday to the Aldermen and their ladies, and several private friends. The convivialities of the Mansion House, since the new Mayoralty commenced, have been almost daily, and upon the most magnificent and hospitable scale. Every Alderman in town was at the dinner on Tuesday, and a number of strangers also.

THE PRICE OF BREAD IN THE METROPOLIS.—The price of bread in the East end of the metropolis has, within the last two or three days, been raised from 9d. to 8½d. for the best, and from 6d. to 8½d. per 4lb. loaf of the inferior quality. On the Surrey side of the river, the price remains as before, viz., best, 9d.; second ditto, 8d.; some is sold as high as 10d. In the neighbourhood of Chelsea and Brompton, also, prices remain much as they were previously. According to the present price of bread, it is nearly twice as dear as it was this time last year.

MILDNESS OF THE SEASON.—Covent-garden on Wednesday assumed quite a spring-like appearance. Primroses, violets (sweet scented), cowslips, anemones, and many of the flowers which bloom usually in the month of February, were presented for sale in high perfection, the colours being good, and the scent powerfully odoriferous. The gooseberry bushes in the gardens give, at present, great promise of an abundant quantity of apple and pear blossoms, and if the buds are not cut off by blight or frost a great supply of both may be expected.

ANOTHER SUPPOSED ACCOUNT OF THE LOST "PRESIDENT" STEAMER.—The Madrid Gazette of the 13th inst. states that the Minister of the Interior had received the contents of which the following [illegible]s only could be deciphered:—"Ship President. We are blocked up in [illegible]d we can't live much time.... Kind friend will acquaint our.... We are dying of hunger.... I am fainting.... If .." The bottle was found by some fishermen, and handed to the Alcalde of Morrico, a few leagues from San Sebastian. A copy of the paper has been communicated to the British Minister.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

Letters from Athens of the 5th instant, state that the candidate for the Presidency, nominated by the Colettí Cabinet, had been elected by a large majority, which had given great delight to the friends of Government.

The Brussels papers state that a frightful accident occurred at Dixmude, (Belgium) on the 13th of this month. A part of the hospital fell down, and buried seven persons in the ruins; two were killed on the spot, the five others were extricated more or less hurt.

Advices from Rome state that a Consistory was to be held on the 19th of last month, when the Patriarch of Lisbon, Archbishop of Aix, and Archbishop of Naples were to be created Cardinals. The Roman Court had just received the resignation of M. Dupuch, Bishop of Algiers, who, it appears, is about to retire to a convent of La Trappe.

We have intelligence from New Zealand to the 26th August. At that date affairs they wore a gloomy and ominous appearance. John Heki was still unconquered, and likely to remain so. He had had the impudence to send word to the governor, that unless the troops were sent to fight him at the Bay of Islands, he would come and attack Auckland. To avert the fulfilment of this threat, the troops had been sent round in the Harard and Daphne.

Captain Twopenny, whom our readers will recollect as the companion of Sir Lawrence Jones, Bart., when that gentleman was lured by the landtid, on his road from Macri to Smyrna, and who was himself also wounded, reached Malta on the 29th of December, from Constantinople, and purposed leaving for Naples the second week in January

A letter from Alexandria, dated Dec. 30, says:—"A few days ago a fine large steam-frigate arrived from Constantinople, having on board the Ambassador sent by the Sultan to assist at the marriage of Mehemet Ali's daughter. The presents consist of a handsome sword set in diamonds to the Viceroy from the Sultan, who sent to the bridegroom a snuff-box and a Turkish pipe, both richly studded with precious stones, and to the bride a large open fan, set in diadem. The Sultan's mother sent two splendid pipes, a rosary, and a bouquet of precious stones to the young couple."

The Freeman's Journal, belonging to the Marquis of Conyngham, caught fire in the Custom-house docks, Dublin, last week, and was damaged to the extent of between £600 and £1000. A package of blue lights ignited, and communicated with a canister of gunpowder, which blew up with great violence.

Letters from Reikiavik (Iceland), state that Mount Hecla has resumed its eruptions, and that they are as violent as ever. A considerable number of earthquakes had been experienced of the above town.

The Cologne Gazette of the 16th, asserts that the marriage of the Prince Royal of Wurtemberg with the Grand Duchess Olga, daughter of the Emperor of Russia, has been fully decided on, and that the Prince is shortly to pay a visit to the Empress and the Grand Duchess, at Palermo.

Accounts from Stockholm of the 30th of December state, that Sweden is suffering severely from the effects of scarcity of provisions. The greatest alarm has a consequence famine might ensue was felt in many parts, particularly in Upland. The Government had made large purchases of corn from Russia, and had likewise afforded pecuniary relief to the suffering peasantry. So urgent had been the distress, that the troops had been employed to break the ice, for the sake of facilitating the approach of corn-laden ships.

On the 9th inst. a dreadful fire broke out in the celebrated woollen cloth manufactory, at Linskenwalde, (Prussia). The town itself was in great danger, but was happily saved. The manufactory is totally destroyed; it is said to be insured for 200,000 dollars.

According to the last arrivals from the French colonies, the rupture with Madagascar has caused a considerable rise in the price of provisions. The Mauritius and Bourbon have always been supplied with meat from Madagascar, and meat became so scarce that the Colonial Council had been obliged to grant premiums of from 40f. to 120f. a head, according to the distances, for cattle brought from the Cape, Persia, and India.

Ibrahim Pacha, according to a letter from Vernet, in the Independant des Pyrenees, is daily improving in health. He receives numerous visitors, all of whom speak highly of the amiability of his character and many of his qualities. On Twelfth-day his Highness had the cake and drew for the bean, which he gained, and having chosen a Queen, ordered champagne to be served round to the party.

We have accounts from Constantinople of the 31st December, from which we learn that Veighli Pacha, the Governor of Salda, had been deposed, and Kiamil Pacha, formerly Ambassador at Berlin, put in his place. The latter is described as decidedly anti-Russian. The Porte had sent another Commissioner to Syria, Emir Pacha, one of the most enlightened and best educated men in the empire.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

LIABILITY OF PROVISIONAL RAILWAY COMMITTEES.

In the Court of EXCHEQUER, on Tuesday a case was tried, Barnett v. Burdett, in order to test the liability of gentlemen forming the provisional committees of railway companies.

Mr. Jervis (with whom was Mr. Atherton) conducted the case for the plaintiff, and Mr. Martin appeared for the defendant.

The action was brought to recover the sum of £172 10s. 6d. for stationery, printing, and other articles supplied to the Irish West Coast Railway Company, and of which the defendant was one of the provisional committee, and afterwards one of the committee of management.

The defendant pleaded that he did not promise.

Mr. Jervis said the plaintiff was a stationer and printer carrying on business in the City. The defendant was William Jones Burdett, a gentleman of considerable property and standing in the world. The company was called "The Irish West Coast Railway," in which, if he were to be guided by the distinguished names on the committee and the distinguished description they had put forth in their prospectus, he should strongly recommend the gentleman on the jury to make an investment of any spare cash they might possess. Among the articles supplied was all the scrip. It would be proved that the defendant had been a constant attendant at the office, and had been actively engaged in the management of the affairs of the company. The defendant, too, was a party to a resolution by which it was agreed that all the expenses were to be paid out of the first deposits that were received. The plaintiff supplied all the scrip and the prospectuses, and in the latter it was set forth that the population to whom this projected railway would afford facilities exceeded a million. It happened, however, that the company fell into arrears of rent to the extent of £15, and the result was that the landlord was compelled to distrain, and he seized the whole of the scrip. The entire property of the company was seized—books, pens, ink, paper, and the other articles which had been furnished by the plaintiff. The learned counsel then called

William Campbell, Esq., who stated that he was not one of the projectors of the company in question, but he was a member of the provisional committee. He was in connection with other directors, was to be paid from two to three guineas for each attendance, and that the liabilities of the company amounted to £8,000, though they had not sold a single share.

Mr. Martin addressed the jury for the defendant, and commented severely on the fact of one of the ex-directors being brought forward as the principal witness against him.

Mr. Baron Alderson observed that no possible doubt could exist as to the liability of the defendant. He became responsible from the day when he consented to act on the provisional committee, and that was on the 10th of October. The defendant was liable to all the contracts from that day which had been entered into for the purposes of the company, whilst the party who made those contracts for the company was in the position of the agents of the committee. For any debts incurred before the 16th of October the defendant could not be held liable.

The Jury thereupon at once gave a verdict for the plaintiff—damages £119 10s.

Mr. Baron Alderson said it was of no use to read a lesson to some parties, for they would, notwithstanding, place their hands through a halter. The present action, however, might do some good, for it would show them of what foolishness they had been guilty.

 It may be all very well for Mr. Baron Alderson to cast censure upon gentlemen who have served upon Provisional Committees; but, if the spirit of commercial enterprise had been checked, in the first instance, by such off-hand remarks, the country would at this time have been without the immense advantages of Railway communication. Mr. Baron Alderson is fond of a joke—we have heard him indulge in witticisms in a case of life or death; but hasty or peculiar remarks upon serious matters, may sometimes do much harm, and cannot do any good. A number of men have already been lost by individuals of character, who embarked in Railways with fair intentions, and in a legitimate spirit of speculation; and it is rather hard that they should be subjected to ill-considered sarcasms, having no reference to the justice of the case.

DISPUTES WITH RAILWAY COMPANIES.—A long argument has taken place in the VICE CHANCELLOR'S COURT, in the case of Parsons v. Sproat. It appeared that the plaintiff filed his bill, alleging that he had taken a very active part in the formation of the Southampton, Manchester, and Oxford Junction Railway Company, and that many of the shares in the deposits, in respect of professional fees and disbursements. The defendants, who were the members of the provisional committee, and the directors of the Company, demurred to the bill, for want of [illegible]. The want of equity in Wigram, in giving judgment, said he was very glad to have been able to find grounds satisfactory to himself for overruling the demurrer upon both points, without giving any opinion upon the very important point of law which had been argued before him.

MR. GIBBS, THE MONEY-LENDER.—In the INSOLVENT DEBTORS' COURT, on Wednesday, the case of this well known money scrivener and bill discounter was brought on before the petty commissioner, in reference to the proceedings in bankruptcy, and on being refused application for his certificate by the Court, he had, on being taken in execution, applied to this Court, and now appeared for his discharge. The schedule filed by the insolvent is an extraordinary document, exceeding 100 pages of parchment. The debts in the aggregate are set forth at £302,000, of which sum £81,000 were without consideration, and £290,000 more secured upon a like amount of the deposits, in respect of professional fees and disbursements. The defendants, who were the members of the provisional committee, and the directors of the Company, demurred to the bill, for want of [illegible]. The want of equity in Wigram, in giving judgment, said he was very glad to have been able to find grounds satisfactory to himself for overruling the demurrer upon both points, without giving any opinion upon the very important point of law which had been argued before him.

IRELAND.

THE REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—On Monday there was a very crowded meeting at the Conciliation Hall; probably, the number of artisans and labourers present fell little short of 1800. Mr. O'Connell's speech was chiefly remarkable for some severe comments upon the Cambridge election.

ANOTHER MURDER. The Waterford Chronicle, of Saturday last, contains an account of the murder of an old man named Walshe, and the grievous wounding of his two sons, who are considered in a hopeless state. The deceased and his sons were proceeding from Waterford to Curraghmore in the county Kilkenny, about ten o'clock on Thursday night, when they were attacked by four men, who inflicted most fearful injuries upon them. The murdered man was carried, and others inflicted the wounds of which old Walshe died was identified by the survivors. The names of the prisoners are Grant (the principal), Halligan, Bryan, and Power.

INCREASE IN THE ARMY.—It is reported, that an increase in the army, to the extent of 6000 men, will be proposed to Parliament. It is said that the Duke of Wellington was anxious to add 10,000 men to our military force, but that his colleagues in the Cabinet was overruled in the Cabinet.

THE SECOND REGIMENT OF FOOT.—The 2d, or Queen's Royal Regiment of Foot, are about to be presented with a new set of colours. This gallant corps embarked for foreign service in 1834, proceeding to India, where they remained until a short time since.

THE CASE OF THE SHIP "TORY."—Captain Johnstone, who stands charged with three murders on board the ship Tory, on her voyage from Hong-Kong to London, and also with cutting and wounding twelve of the crew, has nearly recovered from his severe illness, and he will be tried at the ensuing sessions of the Central Criminal Court, which commence on Feb. 2. All the wounded men have recovered, except Geir, who received twenty-five sabre cuts about the head, face, and body, and Morris, the Frenchman, who was shot by the captain. It has been resolved that three bills for wilful murder, and twelve for cutting and wounding, shall be presented to the Grand Jury. The prisoner has become more cheerful of late, and does not betray the least symptoms of a disordered intellect. The Attorney-General and other learned counsel will conduct this important prosecution on the part of the Crown.

Letters from Warsaw state, that the Emperor Nicholas, in his passage through that capital, had received those Paskewitz with great coldness, and had even expressed to him his disapprobation of the late political arrests.

OPENING OF PARLIAMENT, BY HER MAJESTY.

HER MAJESTY'S ARRIVAL AT THE HOUSE OF LORDS

THE PROCESSION T

OPENING OF PARLIAMENT, BY HER MAJESTY.

THE SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

ROBING ROOM HOUSE OF LORDS

OPENING OF THE SESSION OF PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

The Session of Parliament was opened on Thursday, with the usual formalities. Soon after twelve o'clock the gallery was crowded with beauty and fashion, and before one the body of the house was nearly filled with Peeresses and ladies of rank, whose splendid attire gave additional lustre to their personal attractions.

The Duke of Wellington entered the house about a quarter before one. His Grace, we are happy to say, appeared in excellent health and spirits.

The Lord Chancellor arrived shortly afterwards, and entered into a familiar conversation with his Grace and several other Peers, by whom he was speedily surrounded. The Duke of Cambridge, with his usual freedom, chatted with all that came at his way. His Royal Highness was accompanied by Prince George.

About ten minutes after two a discharge of artillery and a flourish of trumpets announced the arrival of her Majesty, who shortly afterwards entered the house accompanied by Prince Albert, preceded by the heralds, the Duke of Buccleuch, the Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Wellington, and other great officers of state.

Her Majesty, having ascended the throne, requested their Lordships to be seated, and a messenger was then despatched to require the attendance of the House of Commons

In the course of a few minutes the Speaker advanced to the bar, accompanied by a considerable number of members.

Her Majesty then read, in her usual emphatic manner, her gracious Speech (which will be found on the first page.)

Precisely at 25 minutes past two, her Majesty retired, and their Lordships adjourned until five o'clock.

The Lord Chancellor resumed his seat on the woolsack at that hour, when the Session was formally opened by

The Duke of Wellington moving the first reading of a bill to regulate select vestries.

Earl Grey, Earl Pomfret, the Bishop of Oxford, the Earl of Verulam, and Earl Spencer, took the oaths and their seats.

The Lord Chancellor then read her Majesty's Speech from the Woolsack; it having been again read by the Clerk at the table.

THE ADDRESS.

The Earl of Home, who moved the Address in answer to her Majesty's Speech, congratulated their Lordships and the country upon the statement her Majesty had been enabled to make of peace throughout the world. The longer it lasted, the greater the blessing. The noble Earl then concluded, that their Lordships had not to assist the intention they had shown him, and moved an Address, which was nearly an echo of the Speech from the Throne.—Lord De Ros seconded the motion.—The Lord Chancellor then put the question, and declared that the Contents had it.—After a few seconds, the Duke of Richmond rose and said: I am not at all surprised to see the desire which has been evinced to suppress discussion upon——The Lord Chancellor: I beg the noble Duke will not state this. I have stated deliberately for a few minutes; and, finding that the noble Duke was not inclined to rise, I put the question, and put it slowly.—The Duke of Richmond: I am perfectly in order. I should have listened with satisfaction to the speech of the noble Lord who moved the Address, if he had not in part of his speech remarked that we should wait until we heard the statement of the Minister. I have heard, my Lords, enough in that Address to know what the Minister intends to do. (Hear, hear.) He intends to withdraw protection. (Interruptions.) I should like to have heard a more manly speech, and that he had mentioned the Corn-laws at once. I defy noble Lords to say that the Speech just read does not relate to the Corn-laws. This is getting rid of the compact which Sir R. Peel made in 1842 with the agriculturists, and which Mr. Gladstone, Secretary of State, said removed difficulties, and was made for the purpose of securing to the agriculturists a permanent law. It was to secure that permanent law that the agriculturists acquiesced in that sacrifice. (Hear, hear.) I hope this House will not so far abandon its duty as to permit itself to be intimidated by the Anti-Corn-law League, or by the money that body has raised. But what is the time the Government asks us to make this sacrifice to popular clamour? We find that Sir Robert Peel has not produced tranquillity in Ireland; that, on the contrary, murders and assassinations continue to take place every day. (Hear, hear.) In this speech, Sir Robert Peel comes to us, and asks us to give way, and alter those laws which every man knows are for the benefit, not of the agriculturists alone, but of every class in the community. (Loud cries of "Hear, hear.") My Lords, I for one will not give your Lordships the trouble of voting upon an amendment upon the present occasion; but I beg to enter my solemn protest against that part of her Majesty's Speech which threatens the ruin of the agricultural interests, and this House, I think, is entitled to know the reasons why they have come to such a decision.—The Duke of Wellington: The noble Duke has complained of the omission of all allusion to the Corn-laws in the Speech from the Throne. My Lords, it is not necessary in this House to follow my noble friend in his observations on the conduct of the Ministry. (Hear, hear.) Nor do I think it necessary to make any allusions to the Address moved by my noble friend, as I beg to inform your Lordships those measures will be brought before the House in a very few days. (Hear, hear.)—Lord Stanley said: Although he had the permission of her Majesty to make any statement in reference to the subject that was under the consideration of the House, in reference to the circumstances connected with his resignation, he thought the present time was not a proper one for going into explanations. Still, without going into details, he would state briefly the reason why he had separated from those colleagues with whom he had acted for so many years. Although differences had existed which led to his separation from the Ministry, he still entertained for those with whom he had hitherto co-operated, the most unfeigned regard and esteem. (Hear.) He would only take the statement that those were the reasons, and one only, there was a difference between himself and his colleagues. On all the others they were agreed. The measure to which he referred had relation to the degree and nature of protection that was to be afforded to the agricultural interest. (Hear.)—Lord Brougham rose, also, to express the gratification which he experienced at the course which Government had pledged themselves to adopt with regard to America. He also approved of the principles which they meant to act upon in trade, and entered at some length into the arguments in support of it. But he disapproved altogether of the proceedings of the body known as the League. He disapproved of its creation of the Corn-laws, and asserted that the taxation or 40s. freeholds was perfectly legal; but he held the wholesale exercise of that legal right to be very unconstitutional. The Sovereign could legally create a battalion of five hundred Peers and send them into the house to swamp the deliberations of their Lordships; but the Chancellor who should dare to put the great seal to those patents, would deserve to be brought to the block; the legal measure would be a most unconstitutional one. He also denounced the raising of large sums of money by any associated bodies except Parliament to be highly unconstitutional and dangerous as tending to foster agitation, and to induce men to engage in it as a trade. He wished to see the country governed by the Crown, Lords, and Commons, and not to have those authorities forced into measures by continual agitation and the force of pressure from without.—After a short discussion, the question was put, and the Address, in reply to the Queen's Speech, was agreed to without opposition.

On the motion of the Duke of Wellington, the usual sessional orders were agreed to. The Earl of Shaftesbury was, for the thirty-third year, appointed Chairman of the Lords' Committees.

The Lordships then adjourned during pleasure, in order to receive from her Majesty a notification of the time she would be pleased to receive the Address.

After the lapse of a short interval, the Earl of Delaware entered the House, and informed their Lordships, by command of her Majesty, that half-past two on Saturday had been appointed as the hour of receiving the Address from their Lordships.

The House then adjourned till one o'clock on Saturday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS. THURSDAY.

The Speaker took the chair at half-past one o'clock. At a quarter past two o'clock the attendance of Members was very considerable.

Soon afterwards Sir A. Clifford appeared at the bar, and summoned the House to the House of Lords, to hear her Majesty's most gracious Speech from the Throne on the opening of the session.

On the return of the Speaker the House adjourned until four o'clock.

When the House re-assembled, and the Speaker having taken the chair, the new Members for Wigan, Worcester, Wales, Southwark, Warwickshire, Antrim County (Ireland), Woodstock, Hereford, and Hertfordshire, took the oaths and their seats.

New Writs.—Upon the motion of Mr. Young, a new writ was moved for for the boroughs of Selkirk and Newark, and also for the shire of Bute, in the room of the Hon. James Stuart Wortley, who had accepted the office of her Majesty's Judge-Advocate-General.—Mr. Turner moved for the issue of a new writ for the West Riding of Yorkshire, in the room of the Hon. Mr. Wortley, now Lord Wharncliffe. The same hon. member moved for the issue of a new writ for the City of Cork, in the room of Mr. Serjeant Murphy, who had accepted the stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds; also for the issue of a new writ for the borough of Cashel, in the room of Dr. Stock, who had accepted the office of the Chiltern Hundreds.—Writs were also moved for the division of East Sussex, in the place of Mr Darby, who has accepted a Commissionership in the service of her Majesty, and for Midhurst, in the place of Sir Horace Seymour, who has accepted the stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds.

Railway Bills.—Sir R. Peel.—I wish to give notice, Sir, that I shall, on Monday next, move for the appointment of a Committee of the Whole House, with a view to ascertain the course which the House will pursue, with respect to the bills which will be submitted during this session for the making of railways.

Commercial Policy of the Country.—Sir R. Peel.—I also, Sir, beg to give notice that, on Tuesday next, I shall move for the appointment of a Committee to consider what should be the future commercial policy of the country.

The Factory Bill.—Lord Ashley gave notice that on the 29th of this month he would move for leave to bring in a bill to limit to ten hours the time for children working in factories.

THE ADDRESS.

The Speaker then read her Majesty's Speech, after which Lord Francis Egerton rose to move the Address in reply. Mr. E. B. Denison seconded the Address, and in doing so expressed a hope that nothing would be left undone by this country to prevent a breach of the present friendly feeling with America, for no doubt the whole world would suffer by such a breach

SIR ROBERT PEEL'S EXPLANATION.

Sir R. Peel then rose, and said he felt that although the course he was about to pursue was unusual, yet he believed it would be consonant with the feelings of the House if he at once entered into an explanation of the causes which had led to the Ministerial changes that had recently taken place. He at once admitted that his opinions upon the subject of protective duties had undergone a considerable change, and he must assert for himself the privilege of yielding to the force of argument, and of acting from the result of more enlarged experience. He did not wish to deprive those of any credit who were the first to contend against protective duties, but his own opinions had been modified by the results of the returns in all those instances in which protective duties had been relaxed. He had closely watched the operation of those duties during the last four or five years, and he was now convinced that the arguments in favour of their maintenance were no longer tenable. (Cheers from the Opposition benches.) He was convinced that low wages were not the result of low prices of food, and he was further convinced that high prices of food were not favourable to a steady and higher protective duties requisite. On the contrary, the experience of three years of abundance and cheapness, proved that they were rather an alleviation, than otherwise, of the evil. For three years preceding those years similar were high while wages were low, while during the last three years prices were low while wages were high. It was impossible to resist the inference that wages did not fluctuate with the price of food, but were subject to the demand for labour, and other causes, having no connexion with the price of provisions. Since the year 1842, when the first invasion was made on the principle of protection, the exports of the country had increased almost 40 per cent, 47,000,000 in 1843, to 58,000,000 in 1844, and, leaving out the trade with China, the increase had been from 42,000,000 in 1842, to 46,000,000 in 1844, and to 51,000,000 in 1845. The returns presented a most similar picture. The reductions in the Customs and Excise had led to an increased degree of prosperity. The state of morality was also a gratifying result of increased prosperity. The commitments throughout the country had enormously decreased; and with regard to sedition and libel, the office of the Attorney-General had become a sinecure for the last two years. Employment and low prices must have contributed to this result. The right hon. Baronet then proceeded to show that in flax, wool, lard, and other articles, the increased imports of them from abroad, in consequence of the reduction of protective duties, had not lowered prices, which, on the contrary, were enormously increased in almost every instance, and more particularly in the three articles mentioned. Notwithstanding the conviction thus brought to his mind, yet he thought that he was not the person upon whom the proposition of a recommendation to the Corn-laws ought to fall. He felt it would be impossible for him to meet the proposition of the hon. member for Wolverhampton with a direct negative—he felt he could not defend the Corn-laws on the ground of the country being higher taxed, or that they were necessary for the maintenance of high wages; but he wished to have the opportunity of stating to those friends who had so long honoured him with their confidence, that he could continue the same unanimity no longer, and that another line of conduct would be pursued by him with the least fourteen days in which to consider the whole question of protection. At that time, there occurred a great calamity, the results of which were most threatening, and he felt, as the servants of her Majesty, the Ministry were in duty bound to meet the evil, and he was anxious, to enable the House to judge of the motives which actuated the Government to come to the conclusion that the present Corn-laws could not be maintained. The right hon. Baronet then proceeded to read a variety of letters from all parts of Europe, and more especially from Ireland, respecting the failure of the potato crop, and said that those letters and the reports of Messrs. Playfair, Lindley, &c., which were laid, on the 6th of November, in progress in Ireland, and in the papers which he presented to the attention of the Cabinet; but in the meantime his position had been changed by the appearance of the letter of Lord John Russell on the 22nd. He felt, on the 26th of November, that nothing but the support of a united Government would enable him to bring the settlement of the question to a successful issue, for they would appear to be servilely following the recommendation of the noble Lord, in his letter of the 22nd. Even then he would not have abandoned the task if he had been supported by a united Cabinet. The advice was taken to intimate to differ with one noble Lord for whom he entertained the highest esteem Lord Stanley who thought that the danger of the potato crop had been greatly magnified, and that there was no occasion for the Corn-laws to be abandoned. Lord John felt it his duty to resign, and as he was not the only Member of the Cabinet who took the same view of the subject, he (Sir R. Peel) thought it better to retire from the Government. On resignation being accepted by her Majesty, he abandoned himself as a private Member, and he was prepared in that capacity to give every facility to any Government which might be formed for the settlement of the question of the Corn-laws. He returned to town on the Saturday, the 20th of December, when, by command of her Majesty, he again waited upon her at Windsor, and was asked if he would persevere in his resignation. He at once replied that as Lord John Russell had undertaken the office of Ministry he would return to town, and endeavour to prevail on his colleagues to fall into his views. He did so, and his colleagues felt that, under the circumstances, it was their public duty to defer consideration of the Corn-laws, and not to decide the discussion of the day next, by then stating the nature of the proposition he had submitted to the Cabinet, but he would reply to the charge which had been made against him of treason in the Cabinet, and of treachery to his friends, because he was not a traitor had he called for public money to purchase oats, as a substitute for potatoes, while at the same time refusing all relaxation of protective duties. He had been unanimously appointed to those offices by the Queen, and by her power, and who had it in their power to displace him if they chose. He wished it to be understood that he owned no obligation to any man or body of men, for compliance in submitting to the tolls of office. They had not pressed upon him or proffered the privilege of distributing honours, for that privilege of selection gave no pleasure, because its exercise inevitably occasioned more disappointments than reconciliations. He had yielded to the call from a sense of public duty, and he had but one reward, that of being believed to be a loyal and faithful subject. The only value that he could perceive in the possession of power was the increased opportunities which it afforded him of being useful, and according to his own opinions of necessity. He had never used power for any unworthy motive; his actions were consistent with true and comprehensive Conservative principles. His duties were for ever before his eyes, and he had never shrunk from duty and to be relieved from them with honour would be the greatest boon which could be bestowed upon him; but he would never consent to remain Minister of the country with unlimited power and shackled authority. He would hold the office from no servile opinions, but only for the public interests, and to provide for the public security. (Great cheering.) Lord John Russell entered into an explanation of the causes which had led him to write his letter to the electors of London. He thought, in the state of the potato crop, that Government was not doing its duty in not opening the ports; and it now appeared that the right hon. Baronet and the Cabinet were entirely of the same opinion. On the 8th of December he received the commands of her Majesty to wait upon her at Osborne House, and on the 10th, he was enabled to do so, when it was proposed to him to form an Administration. He at once told her Majesty that there were great difficulties in the way—that his friends were in a minority in both Houses of Parliament, and it would be, therefore, impossible to propose a settlement with any hope of success. Her Majesty immediately placed in my hands a letter from Sir R. Peel, stating his reasons for resigning, and also stating that, as a private member, he would give every facility to any Government which might be formed for the settlement of the question of the Corn-laws. He consulted with a few friends, and they all felt a desire to know the exact nature of the proposition which the right hon. Baronet had submitted to his Cabinet. He accordingly communicated with Sir Robert Peel, who gave him all the information which he himself possessed, but did not think it expedient to enter into the particulars of his proposition. Then came the question, whether they should submit their contemplated proposition to Parliament at once, or dissolve and call a new one. He (Lord John Russell) thought it better not to dissolve unless they could be certain of the support of the right hon. gentleman, and of a considerable number of his colleagues. The right hon. Baronet, however, for reasons which he (Lord J. Russell) admitted to be cogent, thought it was not advisable that a person out of the service of the Crown should be consulted. He agreed with the right hon. Baronet on the measure which the right hon. Baronet had intended to propose for the settlement of the question, that measure being contained in his letter to her Majesty. It was a present suspension of the Corn-laws, and their total repeal at no distant period, by a gradual reduction of duty; this gradual reduction, he thought, would be an advantage more apparent than real to the landlord. He, however, stated to the right hon. Baronet all the difficulties of his position, and her Majesty replied, by saying that she had sent his letter to Sir R. Peel, who had replied by saying that he would support a proposition for the settlement of the question. But he could not undertake that he could obtain the consent of those he had consulted. When he next attended her Majesty, she gave him a letter from Sir R. Peel, in which he stated that as regarded supporting a total abandonment of the Corn-laws, he did not think that he ought to be fettered by such a pledge. In consequence of that letter he undertook the formation of the Government, though he felt that he was incurring a great risk, for if they were to be exposed to the charge of having undertaken what they were unable to perform. The following day, however, he had to communicate to his colleagues a letter he had received from Lord Grey stating reasons why he could not support the proposition that he would support for the ability, courage, and honesty of Lord Grey, this alone would not have caused him to give up; but when he remembered that he was the first amongst them all in that House to declare himself in favour of free trade and total abolition of all prohibitive regulations would be put upon his absence from the Government. He therefore wrote to her Majesty, informing her of the impossibility which he found in his way of forming a Ministry. He had now been a year relieved of the Corn-laws without gradation or delay, but accompanied with the removal of some of the burdens pressing upon agriculture. He felt the deepest gratitude to her Majesty for her kindness during these negotiations, and also the right hon. Baronet, for his spontaneous offer of support, in the first instance, and there was nothing in his subsequent letters which at all increased the difficulties of his position. The noble Lord concluded by stating that his only regret for not having succeeded in forming a Ministry was, that he was thereby prevented from bringing forward a measure he believed would have conferred on the humblest of the people of Ireland

Disraeli then addressed the House in a speech of considerable ability, and replete with personal acerbities towards Sir R. Peel, for having, as he (Mr. Disraeli) alleged, betrayed those who had placed him in power for the sole purpose of maintaining the principle of protection.

After some further discussion, the Address was carried without opposition; and the House adjourned at ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

The House was for some time occupied with the consideration of the usual standing orders.

Railway Deposits.—Lord John Russell wished to know from the right hon. gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether the amount of the deposits on Railway Bills had yet been taken into consideration. Last year the amount paid in was £2,000,000, but this year it was calculated that £5,000,000 would be the sum; and that amount might cause a very great depression in the money market.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer said he felt exceedingly obliged to the noble Lord for having given him an opportunity of removing from the public mind any doubt that might have existed as to the course the Government intended to pursue on this subject. The House was aware that, on a resolution of the standing orders of the House, all parties engaged in Railway speculations were bound to pay a deposit equal to three-fourths of the whole expense of the undertaking. And by an Act of Parliament, passed a recent Session, the parties making the deposit had a right to have the money invested in the Accountant-General in any way they should think fit. About the middle of November last, an application had been made to him by very respectable parties in the noble Lord for having given him an opportunity of removing from the public mind any doubt that might have existed as to the course the Government intended to pursue on this subject. The House was aware that, on a resolution of the standing orders of the House, all parties engaged in Railway speculations were bound to pay a deposit equal to three-fourths of the whole expense of the undertaking. And by an Act of Parliament, passed a recent Session, the parties making the deposit had a right to have the money invested in the Accountant-General in any way they should think fit. About the middle of November last, an application had been made to him by very respectable parties in the city, for a definite answer should be given as to the course the Government intended to pursue in reference to that order; and it was then suggested that the resolution should be so altered, that parties, instead of being compelled to invest their deposits in Exchequer-bills, or Government Stock, or India Bonds, should be allowed to invest in bills of exchange. To the application so made he gave an answer, which he had resolved upon after due consideration, to the effect that he could not give an assurance of any alteration in the standing order in question. Under these circumstances, he did not feel justified in holding out any hope that any proposal for an alteration of the standing order in question would be laid out, or that he would not resist any such proposal if it should be made. He had every reason to believe that the difficulties apprehended from the order as it now stood were not founded in fact, and that, therefore, he would not be justified in making any alteration of the order.—Mr Masterman said, that as he had enjoyed the honour of being the medium of communication between the parties referred to and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he felt it necessary to state the extent to which the answer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the right honourable Baronet; his fingers certainly itched last night to be allowed to say a word.—[Laughter.] He must acknowledge that this interview with the Chancellor of the Exchequer was anything but satisfactory. The answer he had received left the matter quite in as much doubt as it was before, and it was of more importance to the public at this than the last fourteen days in this matter had occasioned serious inconvenience to several gentlemen of high repute in commercial circles.

The Corn-laws.—On the question for bringing up the Report on the Address, Mr. Colquhoun said that he should crave the indulgence of the House for a few moments. He begged to express his opinions upon one of the questions raised by the speech of the hon. gentleman the member for Stockport, who stated last year with the honourable member for Wolverhampton, with the opinion that the preservation of a moderate protective duty would be desirable for the country. It was not his intention to enter at length into the questions which had been introduced last night, either by the honourable member for South Lancashire, or the right honourable Baronet; his fingers certainly itched last night to be allowed to say a word.—[Laughter.] He must be determined upon it; this matter had occasioned serious inconvenience to several gentlemen of high repute in commercial circles.

Members! Good easy souls, anxious to be at peace with themselves and all the world, dragged out of their fat and quiet content to serve on Committees and listen to Cobden. Against this last infliction they have a remedy—slumber is not forbidden them. But they would fain sing, in the spirit of Tennyson's lotus eaters (the true descendants of which easy going race exist in your genuine country gentlemen)—we hope the poet will forgive us the parody —

Why are we doomed to Roebuck's prosiness,
Tired out with Cobden's talk about distress,
When all but M.P.'s rest from weariness?
All men have rest, why should we toil alone,
We only toil who are, alas! M.P.'s,
And list perpetual drone,
Of men who mind all business but their own;
Nor ever take our ease,
Except at Bellamy's;
Nor steep in slumber's balm the weary head,
Nor vote with Brotherton, when one agrees
Its time to ho to bed,
Why should we only toil who have large properties?

Unhappily a man can't go to sleep on a Committee. For all he understands of the jargon of opposing counsel, or the technicalities of engineers, he might as well be at Jericho as in St. Stephen's. But the Parliamentary Committee is sacred time, and so the unhappy country gentlemen are sacrificed. Many a worthy son of the soil spent Wednesday night in broken slumbers, thinking of the misery that the next morning would light him on. Visions of Railway Committees must have sat heavy on agricultural souls, not lightened by anticipations of Corn-law repeal. We have put it to Cobden—if the horrors of such a night, as I describe can be known to the agricultural mind, humbly and feelingly.

THE DREAM OF THE COUNTY MEMBER.

The clock struck twelve; 'twas dark and drear,
The Member lay in bed;
He tumbled there; he tumbled here;
And heavy was his head:
And, in dyspepsia severe,
His dinner weighed like lead.

All day long unto inward strife
And gloom he'd been a prey,
And, to the questions of his wife,
He answer gave alway—
To-morrow, you're aware, my life,
"It is our opening day."

His deeds of blood had murdered sleep,
And, in his troubled doze,
He saw dead game—a goodly heap—
Cock-pheasants laid in rows,
And slaughtered hares, that round did leap,
A fore-foot to each nose.

To them succeeded many a shape,
Of uncouth mould and grim—
For bodies papers tied with tape,
Theodolite for limb;
And dumpy levels, all agape,
That took surveys of him.

The Member's blood with horror thrills—
They shriek within his ear,
" We are the Ghosts of Railway Bills
That should have passed this year,
But standing orders, 'gainst our wills,
Keep us in limbo here.

" Yea—standing orders, harsh and hard,
Our infant growth have stopped:
By them from Board of Trade debarred,
Like foundlings we were dropped;
Sections and plans untimely marred,
And Branch with Trunk-line lopped.

" Look at our cuttings deep and wide,
Our gradients and our curves;
Well may't thou toss from side to side
With racked and raging nerves,
What he not knows who dares decide,
Say what that man deserves?

" Our brother lines that still survive
Shall plague thee in our stead,
All railway projects yet alive
Shall weigh thee down like lead,
The Session's close shall first arrive
Ere thou shalt get to bed.

" On a Committee thou alway
Shalt sit; till, deaf and blind,
Like him whom, as the poets say,
In caves fiends did bind—
Till Hercules tore him away,
But left the skin behind."

The clock struck one—the ghosts depart—
The Member from his doze
Waked with a shriek and horrid start;
And, when the sun arose,
'Twas with a sad and weary heart
He did put on his clothes!

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—During the present week very little English has come to hand from any quarter. The promises in the Speech from the Throne of the 19th ult. created a demand for it, and from the promises in the House of Commons last evening, we hear, duty free sorts were almost nominal. Of foreign wheat, both free and in bond, the quantity on hand is very large, nevertheless the sale for it was unusually depressed, without, however, any alteration in the quotations. The few parcels of barley now quite at market, and all other kinds were a mere drug. In malt very few sales took place, at about stationary figures. Oats, beans, peas, and flour dull, but not cheaper.

ARRIVALS.—English: wheat, 2030; barley, 6800; oats, 560. Irish: wheat, ——; barley, 1000; oats, 1000. Foreign: wheat, 7490; barley, 370 quarters. Flour, 2340 sacks; malt, 2000 quarters.

Wheat.—The prices of wheaten bread, in the metropolis, are from 9d to 9½d; of household ditto, 7d to 8d per 4lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 36s[illegible] barley, 21s 11d; oats, 22s 3d; rye, 34s 9d; beans, 34s 6d; peas, 34s 1d.

Wheat, 36s 6d; barley 22s 3d, oats, 22s 1d, rye 34s 6d, beans, 34s 6d; peas, 34s 1d.

Insurance.—Wheat, 36s 6d; barley 3s 6d, oats 6s 0d, rye 3s 6d, beans, 6s 6d, peas, 6s 6d.

Tea.—Rather an extensive business has been transacted in most kinds of tea, at somewhat improved quotations. Common sound congou is selling at 10d, low yellowish leaf twankay is to be had, fair and useful, 1s 2d to 1s 4d; and common yellow leaf hyson, 1s 11d to 2s per lb. Several vessels have lately arrived from China too ashore.

Sugar.—A better demand has been experienced for West India, at fully previous quotations; indeed, in some instances, 6d per cwt more money has been obtained for fine colory samples. Mauritius have sold steadily, at our former rates. Refined goods are firm, at 42s 6d for brown and 45s 6d for standard lumps.

Coffee.—By private treaty a moderate business is doing in coffee, at about last week's quotations. Very good ordinary Ceylon has produced 50s per cwt.

Hops.—Since last Saturday, 2 M. M. 18 pockets have been sold, at 4l 8s to 5l 5s 6d; old straw, 4l 10s to 5l 15s; wheat straw, 4l 15s to 4l 18s per load.

Hay (Friday).—Although the supply of most kinds of hops on offer here is by no means large, the general demand must be considered inactive. Nevertheless East and Mid Kent hops fully support last week's quotations. Seasoned pockets, 5l 10s to 7l 7s; Weald of Kent ditto, 5l 5s to 6l 7 10s. Mid Kent ditto, 6l 7s to 8l 0s; East Kent ditto, 8l 8s to 10l 10s; Mid Kent bags, 5l 5s to 6l 5s.

Provisions.—Irish butter is in good request, at very full prices. Best hands of Carlow, landed, 92s to 96s; first Cork, 88s to 90s; first Clonmel, 90s to 98s, Limerick, 80s to 86s, and first Belfast, 84s to 86s, per cwt. For forward delivery, next month, and to endsay is doing. Foreign butter is steady, at full currencies, the best quality producing 100s to 110s per cwt. English butter firm, at 68s to 76s for the best Dorset, and 11s to 13s per dozen for fresh. Bacon brisk, at an advance of 1s to 2s per cwt. Prime small Waterford, 50s to 52s; heavy, 48s to 49s; prime Limerick, 48s to 51s; and heavy, 47s to 48s, per cwt. Hams and lard firm, and rather dearer.

Tallow.—Only a moderate business is doing in P. Y. C., at 45s on the spot, and 45s 3d to 45s 6d for the next three months. Town Tallow steady, at 43s. per cwt.

Potatoes. The supplies of Potatoes being large, the trade is heavy, at reduced prices.

Wool.—We have very little business to report in the Wool market; yet prices are pretty generally supported

Coals (Friday).—Morrison's Hartley, 14s; Eden Main, 18s 3d; Hylton, 18s; Kelloe, 19s 9d; Adelaide Tees, 18s; and Barrett, 17s 9d per ton.

Smithfield (Friday). Notwithstanding the supply of beasts here to-day was very limited, and of full average quality, we have to report a dull inquiry for that description of stock, at last week's quotations. [illegible]

[illegible] and prices [illegible] stationary. The veal trade was active, at an improvement within of from 2d to 4d per 8lbs. Pigs steady, at full prices. Milch cows very dull, at from £16 to £18 15s each.

Per 8lbs. to sink the offals.—Coarse and inferior beasts, 3s 8d to 3s 10d; second quality ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 6d; prime large oxen, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; prime Scots, &c., 4s 2d to 4s 4d; coarse and inferior sheep, 3s 4d to 3s 8d; second quality ditto, 4s 0d to 4s 2d; prime coarse-woolled ditto, 4s 4d to 4s 10d; prime South Down ditto, 5s 0d to 5s 2d; large coarse calves, 4s 10d to 5s 6d; prime small ditto, 5s 8d to 5s 10d; large hogs, 3s 10d to 4s 0d; neat small porkers, 4s 6d to 5s 2d. MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The absorbing subject of interest in the Money Market continues to be the probable effect resulting from the payment of the various Railway deposits to the Accountant-General. There has been for some time a [illegible] anticipation, which has led to the withdrawal of [illegible] from the Stock Exchange, and the consequent [illegible] of the Funds. At this moment the Bank of England is pressed on all sides for accommodation, but do not exhibit any great amount of liberality, having altered their ordinary principle [illegible] Many [illegible] have been [illegible] to the Bank, and [illegible] lation on the part of the banking and monied interest, and limitation on the part of the Bank [illegible]

[illegible] to the Railway deposits. Some unfortunate reports are current with regard to two extensive banking establishments, one situated in the West Riding of Yorkshire, and the other in the North of England. It would be premature at present to mention the names; but little doubt can exist that in the first, if not in both instances, the reports are founded on accurate data. The Consols Market has been very much depressed during the week, although it does not close quite so good as it has been. The price on Monday was 94¾ for Account, which on Tuesday advanced to 95⅛, considerable fluctuations having occurred in the interim. A partial reaction has since occurred, and no improvement took place upon the report of her Majesty's Speech being received. The closing prices mark 94¾ to ⅞ for Money, and 95 for Account. Exchequer Bills have improved from 18s to 20 pm, the closing quotation. Bank Stock is good, at the advance of 205½ to 207. Three per Cent. Reduced is 95¾. New Three and a Quarter per Cents. 96⅞ to 97⅛; and India Stock, 263.

The Foreign Market displayed an increased activity at the beginning of the week, but did not maintain it until the close. Brazilian on Monday quoted 83 but has since receded to 81½ Portuguese has been little doing of late. Mexican information has occurred, it closes at 25¾. Mexican improved from Monday's price of 30½ to 30⅝, on Wednesday, but no transaction has taken place since. Spanish Actives on Monday were 27⅞, and on Tuesday advanced to 28¼, leaving more doing at 28⅜. The Three per Cents opened at 38⅜, and have advanced to 39. Dutch Stock has not been largely dealt in; the closing price for the Four per Cents is 95¼. The Two-and-a-Half per Cents are (nominally) 59¾.

The Share Market was very flat at the commencement of the week, but improved in tone as it advanced. Some of the best Scrips have been dealt in at a small discount, and the French lines continue in good request; but, it must be remarked that the rise in French Scrips is the result of some peculiar combination to support the Paris market, which has the effect of producing confidence here—whether justly or not, is a question that time will settle. Altogether the market closes with tolerable firmness, yet any decisive rise is speedily checked by immediate sales. It is apparent that a large amount of Shares is only waiting for a decided advance to be disposed of; and, as it is most probable that the holding over will be an expensive operation at the next settling, any extensive rise at present can be scarcely regarded as probable. The closing prices are:—Aberdeen, 2½; Birmingham and Oxford Junction, 8⅜; Bridgewater and Newcastle, 9; Minehead, ⅜ dis.; Bristol and Exeter, 84½, Buckinghamshire, ¾ dis.; Caledonian, 14½; Ditto New, 4; Ditto Extension, 3⅜; Chester and Holyhead, 16½; Direct Northern, 2⅜; Eastern Counties, 2⅜; Ditto New, 7⅛ pm.; Ditto Perpetual, 5 per Cent, No. 1, ⅜ pm.; Ditto ditto, No. 2, ⅜ pm.; East Lincolnshire, 3⅜; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 7⅜; Ditto Half Shares, 1½; Edinburgh and Perth, 4⅝; Gloucester, Aberystwith, and Central of Wales, 1; Goole and Sheffield, 2½; Great Northern, 22½; Great Eastern and Western, 1⅛; Great Southern and Western (Ireland), 22; Great North of England (New), 33; Great Western, 161½; Ditto Quarter Shares, 20; Ditto Fifths, 3⅞; Guildford, Farnham, and Portsmouth, 6½; Hereford, Hereford and Carlisle, 5⅜; Leicester and Bedford, 7 pm.; Liverpool Manchester, and Newcastle Junc., 4; Lond. and Birm., 223; Ditto Quarter Shares, 26; Lond. and Blackwall, 8½; Ditto New, 3¼; Ditto Extension, 3⅛; Lond. and Brighton, 68½; Ditto Fifths, 2½; London and Croydon, 22⅜; Ditto Guaranteed 5 per cent., 93; London, Roumslow, and Western, 1½; London and South Western, 77; Do. SATURDAY MORNING.—Consols fluctuated yesterday, and closed at the depressed price of 94¾ The Share Market was, in some measure, influenced by the depression in the English House, and closed heavily, although no important decline in prices occurred.

There is a niche at the top of the room, in which a statue of the Duke of Sussex will be hereafter placed. The paintings have been cleaned, and the Masonic emblems re-burnished and gilded, on a ground of transparent blue. The Hall is to be lighted with gas, and the wax chandeliers, which shone but dimly, removed.

According to Mr. Oliphant's interesting account of the Madrigal society, published by Calkin and Budd, it was founded in 1741 at the Twelve Bells, in Bride-lane, by John Immyns, a lawyer, who died in 1761. He played on the harpsichord, viol da gamba, flute, and lute, and had a "cracked counter-tenor voice." Mr Immyns was a member of the Academy of Ancient Music, and tutor to the Chapel Royal. He was so imbued with the love of the ancient school of part-writing, that he determined to found a club, exclusively for the cultivation of such music; indeed, such was his devotion to it, "that he looked upon Monteverdi and Handel as the greatest corrupters of the science." In 1745 the Society removed to the Founders' Arms, Lothbury. The admission fee was 8s., and 3s. per quarter. They returned again to the Twelve Bells, and then, in 1748, went to the Queen's Arms, in Newgate-street. One of the rules was as follows:—"It having been long observed that the Members being permitted to sup within the hours set apart for music, (a more intellectual pleasure), has created great hindrance and confusion in the performance, and perhaps by degrees would have eat up the whole time of the Society, and frustrate the chief intent of their Meeting, the Members of this Society have agreed to reserve an hour and a half each night free from such interruption; and it is hereby ordered, that if any Member shall eat his supper, or any part thereof, after half-an-hour past eight o'clock, and before ten o'clock, on the night of the Society's Meeting, he shall forfeit six-pence, to be applied for buying ruled-paper for the use of the Society."

One of the regulations enjoined a probation of a candidate, in order to ascertain whether he could sing in "time and tune." Most of the members at this period were mechanics; and Sir John Hawkins declares that they sang with a "degree of correctness to do justice to the harmony." They made excursions to Blackheath and Richmond; and, at these merry-makings, tobacco was one of the great luxuries.

In 1769, the Society met at the Feathers Tavern, Cheapside; in 1777, at the King's Arms, Cornhill; in 1778, at the Half Moon, Cheapside; and then at the Leather Tavern. In 1784, the entrance fee was raised to a guinea, and the quarterage to half-a-guinea. In 1792, head quarters were at the King's Head, Poultry, and then at the Globe, in Fleet-street. The next removal was in 1795, to the Crown and Anchor. In 1798, there was a dinner festival; and again in 1802, 1803, and 1809, from which time they have been continued annually. In 1811, a silver cup, for a madrigal after the old masters, was given, and Mr W. Beale won it with "Awake, Sweet Muse." The old harpsichord, used formerly as an accompaniment, was disposed of in 1814. Now the part singing is without the aid of any instrument.

In 1831, the supper meeting, which had existed for fifty years, was changed to a monthly dinner, which is now held on the third Thursday in each month, from October to July, at the Freemasons' Tavern, the Anniversary Festival taking place in January. The yearly subscription is now £4, with a charge of 7s. 6d. for dinner, and 10s. for the Anniversary. In 1827, a perpetual President, Sir John Rogers, Bart., was appointed. To his last and 25th, the Society is deeply indebted for his resignation, on account of ill-health, to Lord Saltoun was elected, and his enthusiasm in the cause may be imagined when we state that he came up expressly from his seat in Scotland, to attend the anniversary.

The Madrigal was the parent of the English Glee, and it is owing to the former species of composition emanating from the Reformation, that we can boast of a national school of harmony. The Society has saved from oblivion many rich and rare gems.

LORD FRANCIS EGERTON.

The mover of the Address in the House of Commons is Lord Francis Egerton: the task is frequently entrusted to a young member of the Ministerial party, as it is considered a favourable opportunity for exhibiting his ability, if he possesses any. But, at a crisis like this, when every movement is of such importance, it is perhaps thought necessary to call in the aid of one experienced in public business, used to the House and to the routine of debate; one not likely to be embarrassed by the novelty of a first appearance before such an assembly. Lord F. Egerton has represented the Southern Division of Lancashire from the year 1835, and he had previously sat for Bletchingly and the county of Sutherland; his position as member of one of the great manufacturing districts of England, may also have had something to do with the selection, as well as his long experience of the House.

His Lordship is the second surviving son of the Duke of Sutherland, and is perhaps even better known to the general public by his former name, than by that of Egerton, which he assumed pursuant to the will of the late Duke of Bridgwater, from whom he inherited extensive property. As Lord Leveson Gower, he gained considerable literary reputation by his version of Goethe's "Faust," which exhibited much command of language and power of versification. He published also some translations from Schiller and other German poets, and was a frequent contributor to the Annuals. His latest literary labour, we believe, is a contribution to a grammar of the Persian language, derived from the work of a learned German, which is to be made available for the English student.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD FRANCIS EGERTON, MOVER OF THE ADDRESS IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

It is pleasing to see men of such high station, escaping for a while from politics into the "fresh fields and pastures new" of literature. His Lordship has held the office of Secretary for Ireland; but in the House he is not a very active party man, or frequent speaker. His consenting to move the Address, of course implies that he gives his confidence and support to the policy of the Prime Minister. His Lordship is in his 46th year; he married a daughter of C. Greville, Esq., of Warwick, niece of the Duke of Portland.

FESTIVAL OF THE MADRIGAL SOCIETY, IN FREEMASONS' HALL.

A CONNEMARA CABIN.—DRAWN BY TOPHAM.

A MOUNTAIN CABIN.—IRELAND.

Joy liveth where he lists; capricious Whim
Plumeth his pinions for their dancing flight,
And any happy heart hath hire for him;
He careth not on domes of gold to light,
On jewel'd Coronet or dazzling throne,
Tho' upon impulse, he will grandeur seek,
Yet his pure smiles are not for Rich alone,
But dimple fondly on the poorest cheek.

So, Poverty wears oft a face of Joy,
Laughing and lovely over all its rags—
Now the girl, rustic; now the ruddy boy,
Whose ruby brim ne'er to sadness flags;
Its leaping spirit radiates through the eyes,
Or maketh merry in the mirthful heart,
Making the creatures glow, like southern skies
That burn with sunshine—Joy in every part!

Joy flies anon from cities and will thread
Thro' happy mazes to the lonely door,
Where the Poor love to hear his cheerful tread,
And his voice troll its music to the moor;
Mountains and rocks to echo it around,
Children to lisp its melody, and love
To warm the humble cabin by the ground,
By the heart-flame that's kindled from above.

Now here is such a cabin, where it seems
That Joy is Childhood's visitor to-day;
The crowd are far away, hills, rocks, and streams,
List to youths' voices, and resound its play.
The hut, a little castle built of stones,
Piled raggedly; no windows, and the door
A cavern entrance; but the laughing tones
Of a glad child come singing from the floor.

A floor of mud, and wretchedness—and still,
The tiny boy looks fat and full of glee;
And his eyes sparkle up with pleasure's thrill,
The sweet smile of his sister fair to see;
A blooming mountain-flower, blushing bright,
In the rich day-beam, tending her young brood
Of birds, that hardly yet have caught its light,
And yet are craving for their early food.

A goat skips round the beetle of the rock;
There is a tripping spirit over all—
An airy elasticity, to mock
Each heavy thought that on the heart would fall.
Childhood hath shaken hands with Joy, and so
Grief is chased off, and Lightness chirps its lay;
And all the living landscape seems to glow,
And dance in unison with Childhood's play.

Now beautiful impressions throng the mind,
And harmonise with Nature, till the brain
Teems with a thought that leaves a gloom behind
That with its moral saddens all the strain.
This Hut, with Childhood's presence blest alone,
Seems lovely but invade the mountain mist
By the rude men who make its rocks their throne,
And, lo! it is the cradle of unrest

It is an Irish Cabin:—Passion's strife
Converts the Child's home darkly to the lair;
With angry grief the Peasant's soul is rife,
For Agitation's storm hath roach'd even there
Hate hath gone up where Love was meant to dwell,
Loosing the evil spirits of its wrath;
Childhood and Joy grow dim before the spell,
And Hunger moans along a footless path!

FREAK OF FORTUNE. On Wednesday, one of those sudden changes of fortune which occasionally occur happened to a man named John Carturit, living in Mary-street, Hampstead-road, who received intelligence that, by the death intestate of an uncle in Liverpool, he had become possessed of £8,000 personal property. Carturit, who is a hatter, was in very reduced circumstances, and when he received the pleasing intelligence was about applying for parochial relief.

WINCHESTER PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The second Concert of the above Society for the Season, took place on Tuesday last. The programme was unusually long, being divided into three parts; the first consisting of a portion of "The Messiah;" the second, a selection from Handel, Mendelssohn, and Haydn; the third, the "Sabat Mater" of Rossini. The Concert commenced with the Overture to "The Messiah," when Mr. Lockey, (being his first visit to this city), gave that beautiful song, "Comfort ye my People," with a chasteness of style and propriety of expression that made a deep impression on the audience. This gentleman, a pupil of Sir G. Smart, possesses a genuine tenor voice, of even and pure quality, combining sweetness with power in an unusual degree; and, as he evidently studies to understand his subject, and aims at no unnecessary display, we venture to consider him an acquisition to the musical world of no ordinary value.

Mrs. Weiss (late Miss Barrett), had ample scope to display the fine quality and compass of the powerful organ with which she is gifted. Miss Duvall would have been heard to better advantage in a room of smaller dimensions. Mr. Leach, of the Cathedral choir, was the principal bass: his rich, mellow voice, correct style, and certain execution, told with their usual effect. The choruses were sustained with extraordinary spirit and precision. The veteran Dr. Chard presided at the piano-forte; the band and choruses were led by Mr. E. W. Thomas, who gave a solo on the violin in his usual masterly style.

About 300 persons were present, including the Very Rev. the Dean of Winchester (who is the President;) many of the Clergy, and the principal families in the neighbourhood.

THE ETHIOPIAN SERENADERS.

A party of American minstrels, under the above designation, commenced on Wednesday night at the Hanover-square Rooms, a series of concerts, for the avowed purpose of affording an accurate notion of Negro character and melody. These artists are remarkably clever, and admirably "made up." They are painted jet black, with raddy lips, and large mouths; and being capital actors, the deception created is so great that wagers have been offered that they are really "darkies." They dress in dandy costume, à la Julien—that is, white waistcoated and wristbanded, turned up in the most approved D'Orsay fashion. Of course, it is impossible to come to any right conclusion as to the authenticity of the African airs, especially as they have arranged the compositions of the great European masters in such a grotesque manner. The executants are five in number; one plays the tambourine, Mr. Germon, who is the leader; another, the bone castanet; the third, the accordion; and the two others, the banjo, or African guitar. The castanet player does not sing, but his four colleagues have good voices, and in glees harmonise charmingly. In a quartet, a parody on the Phantom Chorus, from Bellini's "Somambula," and in a glee, "You'll see them on the Ohio," nothing could be more effective than the skilful blending of the parts. It is, perhaps, the bufo exhibition which will create the greatest sensation, and in this quality they are inimitable. The tambourine performer affects a ludicrous air of pompous sentiment, whilst the castanet sable hero indulges in all kinds of buffoonery and antics. He is a wonderful player—no Spaniard can rival him in the rapidity, delicacy, and precision. A scene called a "Railroad Overture," causes an explosion of laughter; they seem to be endowed with perpetual motion; and the scream of the whistle, at the same time with the noise of the engine, beggars all description. The entertainment is quite a novelty, and will, no doubt, be attractive. They have been provided with letters of recommendation from President Polk, and some leading personages in America, who must be better able to appreciate the accuracy of their African delineations than Europeans.

GERALD GAGE; OR, THE SECRET.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SUSAN HOPLEY," ETC.

CHAPTER III.

BEFORE Gerald quitted Miss Dering's lodgings, on that night, he had, as may be supposed, put her in possession of Mr. Pilrig's grand secret; and it was arranged between them, that she should throw herself on Mr. Weston's generosity to forego and to forgive—that is, that she should ask him to release her from the engagement she had entered into but two days before; and to pardon her for the involuntary deception she had practised, and the disappointment she was about to inflict: and, painful as the dilemma was, she had every confidence in the success of her appeal. For her own part, she was deeply grieved and ashamed; but she knew Mr. Weston was a man of a philosophical mind, and a calm temperament, and she did not apprehend that his pain would be very acute or very durable; and as he was also very reasonable and very benevolent, she felt assured that he would believe what was true—namely, that she had fancied her heart was free when she accepted him; and that he would much rather she told him the truth now, at the expense of inflicting a temporary disappointment, than that she should fulfil her engagement, at the risk of making herself and him permanently miserable. The embarrassment of this communication was, necessarily, the first subject that engrossed her thoughts; but when, on the following day, the letter to Mr. Weston was dispatched, other cares and anxieties came crowding thick and fast upon her. She knew Gerald well, and although, to her sorrow, she found she loved him still—she loved him in spite of many and great faults. He was handsome, clever, accomplished, and eloquent; but he was impetuous and selfish—and too much the creature of circumstance to be relied upon under any circumstances. What could be a greater proof of how little he was to be depended on, than the manner in which he had neglected her for the last two or three years? She, whom he had vowed to love, and whom, he now declared, he had never ceased to love—he had left her to struggle with her poverty and her loneliness, unsupported and unconsoled. Money he had none, neither had she—for he was the son of a poor clergyman, who was starving himself, to keep his son at Oxford till he could take orders; and she was the daughter of a general officer, whose income had died with him; and who, having lived expensively, had little to leave for the support of his wife and child, but the poor pension that Government afforded. Mrs. Dering had soon sunk under a loss and a reverse, which her already impaired health unfitted her to encounter; and Emily, educated in affluence and bred in elegance, was left, at seventeen, to struggle with the cold world alone, and to make the sad experiment, on how little life and a respectable appearance could be supported. Their mutual poverty had prevented the young couple marrying in the first bloom of their attachment; but for some time after her mother's death, Emily had been cheered and supported through her afflictions, by Gerald's attention and kindness. But, as time advanced, his attentions slackened; his visits to Bath became rare and short, and the correspondence, which had, at first, been regular and frequent, had gradually declined, till it had died away altogether, and Emily knew nothing of Gerald's movements but what she occasionally gathered from his father. In the meantime, the reduction of her circumstances had kept pace with that of her consolations. The small sum that remained to her after her mother's death was daily becoming less, and the pension she received was altogether inadequate to her support. Sorrows and difficulties were thickening around her. Gerald's long neglect not only appeared sufficient to release her from her engagement, but seemed to justify her in the belief that she would be doing him a service in releasing him from his; and his father, who looked upon their union as hopeless, and considered their attachment a mutual misfortune, encouraged her in these views of the case. Under these circumstances, she had accepted Mr. Weston; and, had not Gerald unfortunately learnt her intentions, and found his love so far revived, by the apprehension of losing her, that he started instantly from London to enforce his own long-neglected claims, a few weeks more would have seen her the wife of a worthy, wealthy man, of a certain age, whose kindness would have rendered her duties easy, and whose reasonable expectations would have been satisfied with such a degree of affection as that kindness would have ensured. But now all was undone again, and Emily was once more on the wide world; for though Gerald had convinced her that he could not part with her without pain, and although he had revived in her breast the fire that neglect had chilled, and so rendered her union with Mr. Weston impossible, he had not convinced her that his character was changed, and he had not shown her any way out of the difficulties that encompassed them. As for Mr. Pilrig's story, it might not be true; besides, if it were, Mr. Livingstone might alter his intentions and his will ten times before he died; and, even in the most favourable view of the case, the prospect of great wealth hereafter could be of no use to them now; and five hundred pounds in hand would have been worth a million in prospective.

To give him his due, these thoughts weighed heavily on Gerald's mind, too, as he walked that night to his father's house; and he felt keenly the justice of Emily's reproach, "How selfish and how cruel it was of him to come!" But the mischief was done, and the question that remained was, how was the injury he had done her to be compensated. There was but one way that he could see, and that was to marry her immediately, and persuade his father to let her live at the vicarage, until he had taken orders, and obtained some means of supporting her himself; and this, with a heavy heart, when he had heard the story, Mr. Gage acceded to. But, when the plan was proposed to Emily, although she consented to accept the shelter offered her, she recoiled from the idea of an immediate union. She felt that there would be a want of delicacy towards Mr. Weston in so abruptly transferring the hand to another, which she had, within so short a period, promised to him; and she insisted on a delay of six months; which interval was to be employed by Gerald in completing his studies, and by his father in the most strenuous endeavours to obtain some provision for his future subsistence.

CHAPTER IV.

Mr. Livingstone and Mr. Gage had been schoolfellows at Winchester, and fellow collegians at Oxford. They were both the sons of poor clergymen, and both designed for the church; but just at the moment that, with anxious hearts and throbbing heads, they were preparing for their examination, Obi, as he was commonly called by his familiars, received an invitation to India, from a connexion who was prosperously settled there; and, bidding adieu to theology and the Greek Lexicon, he started upon a new and more hopeful career. From that period, although they had vowed eternal friendship several hundred times, Mr. Gage heard no more of his chum, till he happened, many years afterwards, to read in the newspaper that his old friend had returned from India, the possessor of enormous wealth. But for the last clause of the paragraph, he would have made some attempt to renew the acquaintance; but he was himself so very poor, that the "enormous wealth" deterred him; and it was by accident only that Mr. Livingstone's recollection of his fellow student was revived. He chanced to see a card lying on the table, one day, when he called at his solicitor's, inscribed with the words Gerald Gage. The name struck him, and, on enquiry, he learnt that the owner of it was the son of his former friend. No intimation of this discovery, however, reached the obscure vicarage of N——, and the extraordinary consequences that resulted from it would have remained an unsuspected and an impenetrable secret, but for the strange indiscretion of Mr. Pilrig. As Obi had always shown a tendency to eccentricity, old Mr. Gage, to whom the affair was communicated by his son, had no great difficulty in believing that he had made such a will; but the probability that he might alter it, and the remoteness of any advantage to be expected, if he did not, induced him to urge his son to banish the subject as much as possible from his mind, and Gerald promised that he would return to Oxford, and finish his studies, as steadily as if no such contingency awaited him; and whilst we leave him to fulfil these laudable intentions, we will introduce our readers to Mr. Livingstone's drawing-room, in Portland-place; where, seated in an easy chair, and surrounded by every appliance of comfort and luxury, the respected possessor of so much wealth was solacing himself alternately with his hookah, and a pile of Indian newspapers that lay beside him. He wore a brown wig, and a brown coat, and shorts of the same colour. His age might be sixty-five, but there was nothing either in the appearance of his face or of his well-formed legs, which were clothed in white-ribbed cotton stockings, that would have been very encouraging to a legatee. The expression of his countenance was not ill-tempered; on the contrary, there was a spice of fun and humour about the nose, and in the small twinkling eyes; but there was something around the mouth, and the closing of the lips, that denoted a degree of firmness amounting to obstinacy. On the opposite side of the fireplace, attired, although it was morning, in a small blue gauze turban, and a green silk dress, with her collar all awry, and a locket and chain, that were intended to be in front, hanging over her left shoulder, sat Miss Sally Nicoll, a middle-aged lady, to whom Nature had never been very kind in the matter of personal attractions, and whose incongruous taste in dress, combined with a total incapacity for putting on her wig, or anything else she wore, straight, gave a comical air that was very apt to excite laughter in those who were not accustomed to her appearance. She was a distant and poor relation of Mr. Livingstone's, and, when young, had gone out to India to look for a husband, but, not succeeding in the speculation, had ever since resided with him in the capacities of housekeeper, companion, nurse and interpreter; for the old gentleman was very deaf, and, for more reasons than one, preferred having an interpreter of his own to applying to people to repeat what they had said. One of these was that he detested bawling; whilst Nicky, as he called her, knew the exact tone that was most agreeable to his auditory nerves; and another, that he, by this means, avoided the conversations he had no desire to be troubled with, and only asked her to repeat when his curiosity prompted the inquiry. But the consequence of this arrangement was, that he heard only through Nicky's ears, and understood only through her understanding, except on those rare occasions, when he chose to hear and understand for himself, which, perhaps, he had not unfrequently undergone so much difficulty in accomplishing. Now Nicky's ears were much like those of other people, but her understanding was different; and, although she was the most honest creature in the world, and had every intention of reporting correctly what she had heard, yet the discourse and propositions she conveyed to Mr. Livingstone, had not unfrequently undergone so strange a transmutation in their passage through her mind, that they could never have been recognized by their owners; whilst he, who was satisfied of her truth, never doubted the correctness of her reports, and only attributed the extravagant assertions and unaccountable nonsense that often reached him, to the daily increasing folly of the world; a persuasion, by the way, in which he delighted, and which was a principal element in his happiness, as it was at once, the source of his mirth, the maintenance of his self complacence, and the justification of the obstinacy, incredulity, and aversion, with which he received the advances of all his connexions.

"Nicky," said the old gentleman, "what's o'clock?"

"Twelve, Sir," answered Nicky, glancing at the or-molu clock on the mantel-piece.

"And that fellow not here yet, although I consented to see his ugly face at half-past eleven. What can he have to say to me.

"I can't think—I'm sure," said Nicky.

"I'll answer for that, Nicky," said Mr. Livingstone, chuckling; "you never could in your life."

"Isn't it natural he should wish to see his uncle?" said Nicky, "even if it were nothing else."

"Uncle!" said Mr. Livingstone, "pshaw! it must be money he wants."

"But he said it wasn't," objected Nicky; "he said he had something of importance to communicate."

"I don't believe him," said Mr. Livingstone. "How should a fellow like that know anything of importance? Who'd tell it him? who'd trust him?"

"But he may have found it out," said Nicky.

"Then it won't be true," said Mr. Livingstone. "However, I shan't believe it, at any rate: I never do believe anybody, especially him."

"No, you never do," answered Nicky, in a tone of quiet assent; adding presently, "There's a knock at the door now; I dare say that's him."

"Come and sit over here," said Mr. Livingstone, "and leave your chair for him; and then you can tell me what he says; I can't bear the sound of his voice."

Nicky did as she was bid; and, in a minute afterwards, the door opened, and the black footman announced Mr. Graves Livingstone, who, advancing eagerly across the room, with his hand extended, "hoped he saw his dear uncle quite well."

Instead of returning the salutation, Mr. Livingstone pointed to the opposite chair; whilst his nose curled, and his eyes twinkled, and his lips closed on one another as firmly as if they intended to remain hermetically sealed for the rest of his life. But the visitor was not a man easily daunted; so, before he sat down, he rubbed his hands over the fire, and observed that it was very cold, and he believed the glass was lower on that morning than it had been all the winter.

Mr. Livingstone did not know what he said, nor did he care to inquire; and the remarks would have fallen to the ground, had not Nicky observed, that she supposed that was the reason she had found a lump of ice in her water-jug in the morning.

"What does he want, Nicky?" said Mr. Livingstone.

"I have something," said Mr. Graves, rising from the chair into which he had just dropped, and approaching his uncle, "of the greatest importance to communicate—something for your ear alone, uncle."

"Tell it to Nicky," said the old gentleman.

"I believe, Sir, it would be better that you should hear me yourself," said the nephew.

"I won't," said Mr. Livingstone, taking up his newspaper.

"Very well, Sir," said the nephew, evidently disappointed and annoyed; "it's a matter that concerns you, not me. I only wish to put you on your guard against a person that betrays your confidence."

"I am on my guard, and I never give my confidence to anybody," said Mr. Livingstone, "so nobody can betray it."

"Excuse me," said the nephew, "there's a certain lawyer called Pilrig"——

"What of him?" said Mr. Livingstone, surprised out of his determination not to listen.

"He babbles about your affairs," continued the nephew—"boasts of being your confidential agent" ——

"The devil he does!" exclaimed Obiah.

"And goes about telling people that you have made a will."

"Did he tell you so?" inquired Mr. Livingstone.

"He did," answered Mr. Graves, "and in the presence of your intended heir too!"

"Then I've no doubt you asked him the question. And pray, did he tell you what I'd left you?"

"No, Sir," said the nephew; "nor did I ask him; he said you had left everything to a stranger of the name of Gage; and, only imagine, Sir, Gage was in the coach himself at the time."

"And that's your business here, is it?" asked the uncle.

"It is," replied Mr. Graves. "I thought it my duty to inform you."

"You needn't have troubled yourself," said Mr. Livingstone, resuming his paper, with an air of indifference, "What a fool says is of no consequence; nobody'll believe him; and if they do, it's of no consequence still."

"Why, Sir, few people like their private intentions to be made known to the World," said Mr. Graves.

"Nobody's acquainted with my private intentions," said Mr. Livingstone, nodding significantly, "therefore, there's no danger of their being made known to the world. And now I want to read my paper, so if you've anything more to say, tell it to Nicky."

"My uncle seems determined not to believe anything against this Mr. Pilrig," said Graves, in a low voice, as he took up his hat and rose to depart; "but I beg you'll explain to him that my only motive for coming was to prevent mischief; for, a person that talks of one thing, may talk of another, and there's no telling what may come of it."

"Very true," said Nicky, "I'll tell him so."

"You know I can have no motive for interfering but interest for him; if it wasn't for that, the man might talk to all eternity for me; but I really couldn't bear to hear my uncle's private intentions blabbed, in that manner, in a stage coach. I was quite shocked. You'll be sure and make him understand this."

"I will," said Nicky, "depend upon it."

"What does he say?" inquired Mr. Livingstone, as soon as his nephew had left the room.

"He says," answered Nicky, "that he wouldn't interfere if it wasn't for his interest; but that he wishes to prevent mischief; and that when he heard of your intentions in the stage coach he was quite shocked."

"I warrant him," said Mr. Livingstone; "and I've no doubt he has been getting round that fool of a lawyer, and sucked this out of him. Write to Pilrig for his bill; and tell John, if he calls, to say I'm not at home."

That night, before he went to bed, Mr. Livingstone tore up the will that Mr. Pilrig had made, and threw the fragments into the fire.

WRECK OF A SCHOONER ON THE SPIT, NEAR SPITHEAD.

WRECK OF A SCHOONER AT SPITHEAD.

An awful gale blew all last Monday night off Portsmouth, from the south-east when, according to the Times Correspondent, "the sea dashed over the walls of the town, deluging the habitations along shore." At about nine o'clock, the schooner Ann and Elizabeth, of Fowey, from Cardiff, laden with iron, for London, drove from her two anchors at Spithead, and struck on the Spit, where she thumped and sank. The captain and crew were in the rigging the whole of the night, until eight o'clock on Tuesday morning, when they were rescued, in a state of great exhaustion, by Reuben Maine, a Portsmouth waterman. Six hands (including the captain) were thus saved from apparently inevitable death. Messrs. Garrant and Gibbon, the agents to Lloyd's, promptly rendered every assistance, and succeeded in saving the spars, sails, three small anchors, and other stores, but all the men's clothes and property have been lost. The captain was putting his desk, containing all his savings, into the long-boat, which was got out directly the vessel struck, when a heavy sea struck her and smashed her to pieces, together with the desk and its contents, which were lost. The schooner struck and sank in less than five minutes. The captain and man describe the night as truly awful

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS, RECENTLY DECEASED.

MRS. CORNWALL BARON WILSON.

The light and poetic literature of the day has lost a gifted contributor in the lamented lady whose death, on Monday, the 12th inst., it is our painful task to announce. Mrs. Wilson was the author of very many poetical productions, which indicated extreme facility of versification, and, though they did not place her in the first rank of female writers, possessed often a tone of grace, as well as of feeling, which justly obtained for them extensive popularity. In 1837, she gained the prize offered by the Melodists' Club for the words of a song; and the more gratifying was her success from the number of competitors—upwards of two hundred—who entered the lists. Previously, in 1834, she had been equally successful in a poem on the Princess Victoria, written for the Cardiff Bardic Festival. Her other productions, scattered through a multitude of publications, besides those given to the world in distinct volumes, might, by a judicious selection, be formed into a collected shape, and thus a lasting reputation secured for their author. At the period of her decease, Mrs. Cornwall Baron Wilson had completed her forty-ninth year. Her widower, Mr. Wilson, is a respectable solicitor, resident in Furnival's Inn, and by him she has left a family, one of which, Miss Florence Wilson, has already appeared in print as a poetic writer of promise.

THE RIGHT HON. JOHN HOOKHAM FRERE.

This gentleman, the friend of George Canning, was the eldest son and heir of the late John Frere, Esq., of Roydon Hall, M.P. for Norwich, and High Sheriff of Suffolk in 1778; and represented a family which has flourished in that county for many generations, in the rank of gentry, and can trace descent from John Frere, of Thurston, who lived in the early part of the 14th century. Mr. Hookham Frere was born May 21, 1769, sat in Parliament for West Looe in 1796, received the appointment of Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in 1799, was sent as Envoy to Lisbon in 1800, and to Madrid in 1802, and became a Privy Councillor in 1804. Subsequently he was Minister with Ferdinand VII. of Spain in 1808, and, in 1809, had the Castilian title of Marquez de la Union conferred on him by the Regents for his zealous services. The right hon. gentleman married September 12, 1816, Elizabeth Jemima, Dowager Countess of Erroll, but has left no issue. His death took place at Malta, on the 7th inst., and will be long felt as an irreparable calamity by the indigent of that island, to whom Mr. Frere was a munificent benefactor.

THE REV. GEORGE D'OYLY, D.D., F.R.S

This pious and excellent divine died on the 8th inst., at the Rectory of Sundridge, Kent, deeply lamented. He was fourth son of the Rev. Matthias D'Oyly, grandson of Thomas D'Oyly, D.D., Archdeacon of Lewes, and brother of the late Sir John D'Oyly, Bart., of Shottisham, Norfolk, K.C.B., aide-de-camp to the Duke of Wellington, and of Mr. Sergeant D'Oyly. Born on the 31st Oct., 1778, he went at the usual age to the University of Cambridge, and succeeded in obtaining the distinguished degree of Second Wrangler. In 1810, he became Chaplain in Ordinary to George III., in 1811, Christian Advocate at Cambridge; and in 1813, one of the examining Chaplains of the late Archbishop of Canterbury, by whom he was collated, in 1815, to the Vicarage of Herne Hill, Kent. This preferment he vacated before a twelvemonth expired, and was inducted to the Rectory of Buxted, Sussex, on the death of his father: in 1820, he was appointed Rector of Lambeth, Surrey, and Sundridge, Kent. In this brief reference to the distinguished churchman whose decease we record, we can merely offer a passing word on his benevolence, his zeal, and his learning.

There was scarcely a charitable or scientific institution in the Metropolis which Dr. D'Oyly did not in some way or other serve; and to his suggestions may be ascribed the foundation of King's College. In theological literature, his labours were most important: and his contributions to the "Quarterly Review," his "Life of Archbishop Sancroft," and his splendid edition of the Bible, undertaken in conjunction with the present Bishop of London and Connor, will long fail to render his name familiar and respected by the religious student. Dr. D'Oyly married, 9th Aug., 1813, Maria Frances, daughter of William Briene, Esq., of London; and has left issue.

SIR HERBERT ABINGDON COMPTON.

Sir Herbert Compton, whose death occurred a few days since, was born in 1776, the son of Walter Abingdon Compton, Esq., of the County of Gloucester. Adopting the legal profession, he entered himself at one of the Inns of Court, and was called to the Bar in 1808. He subsequently proceeded to India, and received the honourable and lucrative appointment of Advocate General at Madras, which he retained until elevated to the Bench in 1831, as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court at Bombay, when he received Knighthood.

THE LATE EARL OF PORTARLINGTON.—By his Lordship's will, of a recent date, the Rocches (Darner) property comes to the Right Hon. Col. George D. Damer, and all charges on his estate, real and personal, goes in trust to Colonel G. Damer and Mr. Cassan, for the use of the present Earl and his issue, in default of which it descends absolutely to Colonel G. Damer. The legacies amount to £30,000. Colonel G. Damer is appointed sole executor.

DECEPTION and FRAUD.—THE STOMACH and ENEMA PUMPS, invented by J. READ, were sanctioned and approved by the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons in London, and by the most eminent members of the profession in this kingdom, on the Continents of Europe, India, and America (vide the life of Sir Astley Cooper). This distinguished patronage induced some unprincipled adventurers to palm upon the public base imitations of Read's Patent Instruments, which has come to his knowledge from the number of paltry instruments which are daily sent him from all parts of the Kingdom, and frequently from India for repair; but as some protection against this fraud, J. R. has instructions from the Hon East India Company to place their mark, in future, on all his instruments next to their Presidencies. But in vain may an humble mechanician attempt to confound or dazzle, step-socks, &c., are boldly and falsely advertised as "Read's Patent Pumps," which have no such resemblance, and which are manufactured only by himself, at 33, Regent-circus, Piccadilly, where they may be seen and proved.—N.B. None are genuine except stamped with the words "Read's Patent."

BRITISH COLLEGE OF HEALTH, New-road, London.—Messrs. MORISON have much pleasure in publishing the following letter, with the writer's permission, as it is a subject in which all the world and Lady Sophia Lely have felt—LIVING in the Hygeian treatment for the last ten years, and therefore her opinion must be allowed to be highly valuable in a matter of such vast importance. Her Ladyship writes—"Railway, near Northwich, Cheshire, December 11th, 1845. GENTLEMEN.—This has been such a candid, widely your amongst the poor, that the demand for your most excellent pills has been very great, and I shall therefore be thankful for the usual supply of them. I take the opportunity of enclosing the Post Office Order for £1. 16s. 6d. [illegible] I [illegible] nothing can be more satisfactory than the progress that your Hygeian Dispensary is making in this part of the country. I remain, gentlemen, Your sincere obliged, SOPHIA GREY To Messrs. Morison." Each Box of the genuine Pills bears the Signature of Directions, and Counsel or Druggist is authorised to sell Morison's Medicines. They are only to be had of the appointed Agents. north-west portion of it will be the part of the exterior most completely exposed to view, both in consequence of the very wide open space on the west side, between Great George-street and the Abbey (it being proposed to clear away St. Margaret's Church), and because both the north and west fronts, with the gateway between them, will come prominently into view from the end of Parliament-street." (Companion to the Almanac, for 1846.) Possibly, the plan not being definitively settled, may explain the little progress made in this front; since the area of the Star Chamber Court is not yet cleared of the old buildings.

TURRET AND PINNACLE, FROM EAST WING.

The reader will scarcely understand our notes unless he refers to the Plan in 74 of our Journal. Presuming him to have this aid, we will enter intra muros, and glance at the state of the principal Courts and other grand features of the design. For this purpose, we return to the East Wing, forming the Speaker's Residence, at the end next Westminster Bridge; "which," says the critic just quoted, "though comparatively a very small portion of the whole, would of itself form a noble piece of architecture—a fine specimen of the style adopted;" and we may add, therefore, especially adapted for our illustration.

Entering by this Eastern front, we first reached the Speaker's Court, which is nearly completed. From thence we crossed a Corridor, to the Commons Court, of oblong form, also completed, or nearly so. Not so, however, the House of Commons, to the right in the Plan; though the flanking division galleries are nearly completed. The House of Commons is not roofed in.

From this point extends in a direct line of 600 feet southward, or parallel with the River Front, through the very centre of the entire Plan, that portion of the edifice appropriated to high ceremony, and to the two "Houses" themselves, viz., the House of Commons, the House Lobby, the Commons Corridor, the Great Central Hall, the Peers' Corridor, the House Lobby, the House of Peers, and the Victoria Gallery. The effect of this long vista will be truly magnificent, as we infer even from its present unfinished state. This line is flanked by five Courts on each side; these in the rear of the River Front being nearest completion.

The Central Octagon Hall, 60 feet in diameter, and 50 feet high, will be a splendid nucleus of this superb pile: two stories are completed, the doorways are magnificent. Externally, this portion will be a noble feature: it will be 365 feet high, or 15 feet higher than the Victoria Tower; "in character it will be totally different, for, whereas, the Victoria tower will be an unbroken, upright mass, this central one will be of tapering outline, and more like a spire divided into a series of stages, with pinnacles at their angles." This striking addition to the Plan has been rendered necessary by the adoption of Dr. Reid's system of ventilation and warming; the apparatus for which, including the Tower, will add an item of £85,000 to the general estimate: we hope the Doctor's plan may be as successful within, as the architectural acquisition promises to be externally.

Westward of the Central Hall will run St. Stephen's Hall, on the site of the ancient St. Stephen's Chapel, the crypt of which remains; the old superstructure has been taken down, but the new one has not yet been commenced. This Hall will be extended by spacious flights of steps, and a porch opening to the south end of Westminster Hall, which is intended to serve as the principal public entrance and vestibule; and, as a sort of public gallery, adorned with statues and frescoes, independently of other decoration and enrichment. This is a grand and promising feature: it would be difficult to name a more interesting edifice in England than Westminster Hall, and the proposal for embellishing it with English character and native art, is highly commendable.

Having retraced our steps to the Central Hall, we advanced, by the Peers' Corridor, to the House Lobby, perhaps, destined to be one of the most admired apartments in the vast suite: the doorway leading into the House of Peers is superb: the elaborate beauty of the oak-leaf and acorn tracery mouldings, and the massiveness of the sculptured crowns, are strikingly effective: in short, all the details of this Lobby are exquisite.

We next reached the House of Peers, 93 by 45 feet, and 50 feet high. This is the most finished portion of the plan, a few of the Peers having pressed for its completion. The flooring is not yet laid; but the metal supports for the Peers' benches are placed: the walls are bare as high as divided by moulding, with boldly-carved drops, into eighteen compartments, each sub-divided into a diamond centre and four others, filled with the insignia of Royalty, the rose, thistle, and shamrock; all exquisitely painted in gold-colour, blue, and red, and superbly gilt, by Crace, of Wigmore-street. Around the Chamber, too, are niches richly dight in corresponding style, to be filled with statues. Already, with only the upper half of the decoration completed, we think the artist has been somewhat too prodigal of ornament; and, by artificial light, we fear the effect will be of overpowering richness. We saw a great quantity of pierced metal plates for the flooring, so as to admit tempered air.

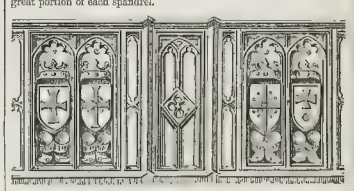
¶ We should here mention that we have been describing only the principal floor of the Plan: many of the apartments beneath are massively vaulted; and, in passing over planks, and iron rafters, sometimes at the risk of stepping through a boss-hole, we were struck with the solidity and strength of the brickwork in the basement.

On leaving the House of Peers, its sumptuous decorations, polychromic and gilt, caused the unfinished state of the next portion—the Victoria Gallery—to appear more remarkable; though, probably, this is owing to some recent alterations in the Plan: one of the deviations from our printed Plan is the addition of a large and lofty bay-window looking into the Royal Court. The walls of this State Gallery are nearly completed, but it is not yet roofed in: its proportions are right-royal—190 by 45 feet, and 50 high. The Commissioners have recommended that in this Grand State Gallery, there be placed twelve Royal statues, including a statue of his Royal Highness Prince Albert. We can anticipate the magnificent effect of the passage of the Royal Procession through this Gallery into the Chamber of Peers.

CANOPIED NICHES.

The two apartments at the extremity of the Victoria Gallery will be the Queen's Robing-Room, and the Guard-Room: the latter will be ceiled with oak and wainscoted with the same to the height of about eight feet, above which it was intended to paint the walls with battle-scenes; but, by the Report of April last, statues were recommended for this apartment. The adjoining Robing-Room will exhibit far greater splendour of embellishment: the ceiling is framed into compartments by richly-carved mouldings, relieved with gilding and colours, and the flat surfaces diapered, heraldic devices, insignia, &c., on a gold ground; the walls in a similar style, with carved panel frames. The statues in this room are to be allegorical figures. As yet, however, the decoration of neither of these apartments has been commenced.

In the landing-places and Grand Staircase the sculpture was in progress; and the mallet and chisel resounded in our ears as we passed over planks down the grand staircase to the carriage-porch of the Victoria Tower, the south arch of which our artist has engraved. The Tower has been carried up as high as the crown of this arch, and the other, West. The proportions are truly gigantic, so as to admit the Royal state-carriage. The sculptural enrichments of these stupendous arches are proportionally grand: the roses in the mouldings are nearly 12 inches in diameter, and the crowns surmounting them are 11 inches in height and project nearly 10 inches from the moulding face. Again: the height of the Royal arms within the crown of the inner arch, we think, cannot be less than 10 feet. The unsculptured masses of stone upon pedestals flanking the main arch will be the Royal supporters. Our artist has also engraved one of the large quatrefoils, which fills a great portion of each spandrel.



HERALDIC PANEL.

In this glance we have omitted all notice of the Decorations, such as painted glass, wood-carving, &c., which are in progress elsewhere; our object being to afford the reader some idea of the present state of the Works at Westminster. We understand that upwards of 800 (of whom 400 are masons) men are employed here upon this great national work: the supply of stone is abundant, and of excellent quality, so that the progress cannot be more satisfactory.

The cost of the building will, unquestionably, be very great; but upon no consideration should be lost this fine opportunity of completing a structure in every way worthy of this great age and country.

THE MINISTERIAL POLICY.

Tuesday last was an important epoch in the commercial history of Great Britain. It cannot so justly be called the beginning of a new era as that day in the session of 1842 on which Sir Robert Peel first acted on his present principles; but it has advanced another stage the progress of that policy which will evidently be the basis of future legislation. In the career of Sir Robert Peel it is one of those occasions which, according as they are met, stamp the character that a statesman must bear in coming ages. At such a crisis, a Leader stakes the reputation gained by years of intense labour by diverging from an old path into one not quite untried, indeed, but which is still veiled in that mist which time alone can dissipate, and whose obscurity favours the formation of those enthusiastic hopes on the one side, and those terrors on the other, with which new regions and undeveloped policies are alike approached. Whether the decision the Premier has made will be considered either wise or bold, is doubtful; for he has himself acknowledged that his plan will "satisfy neither party." Why, then, propose it? Is it meant for rejection? It goes so far, that all Protectionists must oppose it; and it retains so much of the leaven of the old system, as to repel the Abolitionists from supporting it. It is, in fact, one of those middle courses of which Peel is so fond; it is a compromise which will be accepted by neither party. The Agriculturists will think that, having gone so far, the one step more, which would have settled the question for ever, might as well have been taken; since a very low duty, for so short a time as three years, is in effect no protection at all, while the compensations are but small and petty compared to their estimate of the injury they sustain.

This is the great defect of the plan; it will not settle the question. The Premier should either have done a little more, or stopped far short of doing so much. This, of course, applies only to the single question of the Corn-laws. The other parts of the plan are well digested, and give a considerable relaxation of restrictive and unproductive duties, on the principles announced in 1842. For the details, we refer the reader to our Supplement, in which we have given the Premier's statement fully and complete. As to the manner in which that statement was received, we cannot but regard it as somewhat ominous as to its success. Portions of it were loudly cheered, but it was exclusively by the Opposition. In the debate that followed, the preponderating feeling expressed was that of strong, even fierce condemnation, and that from some of the strongest adherents of the Ministry. No Leader of the Whigs gave any opinion on the plan whatever; the Members of the League were wholly silent, and it is not difficult to foresee that there is much in the Plan that they will oppose, and much left out of it that will excite still stronger denunciation. The Premier's prediction, we fear, will be amply verified—"It will satisfy neither party." Formal notice of opposition from the Ministerial benches is already given; opposition from the League may be yet to come. Monday week is waited for with great anxiety.

Any lengthened examination of the details of such a scheme may with advantage be deferred for the present; but a few remarks on the theory on which it is based may not improperly be introduced while those details are under consideration.

In the course of the debate we observe that the change was more than once called sudden and unexpected: many, even now, appear to be taken by surprise. They cannot have read the signs of the times for some years past with much attention. The whole history of the question shows a gradual approach to the present crisis. Like every great theory that has affected the policy and government of states, that of Free Trade has gone through the natural and inevitable stages of discussion, experiment, and application; the next link in the chain is its full development; at that we have not arrived, but the never "unmoving," though, sometimes, "slow," finger that traverses the circle of change is not far from the final point. To this idea, this theory, is irrevocably committed the destinies of the future.

Let us glance at the rise and progress of this commercial theory, which it is essential, although so much and so often treated as one of politics and party, to confine to what it really is—one of trade, commerce, and finance; one of means to ends; one of expedients applied to difficulties; it is a system that is dealt with, not a principle. A system may be changed, if the alteration is manifestly an improvement; a principle remains ever and always the same. Expediency may depart from, and, in so doing, violate it, but the principle itself remains unaffected by the change, and very often regains its lost ascendancy. Our commercial system, like that of most nations, has hitherto been one based upon protection to certain great interests, obtained by placing duties, other than those for revenue, upon the produce of other countries, to prohibit or lessen importation. How has that system, the object of which, even if the means were erroneous, was certainly patriotic, been so shaken that in the opening of the year 1846, and under the most cautious, prudent and practical of Ministers, we see not only the "beginning of the end," but, in no very remote distance, the end itself?

It is a great error to suppose that the change of system is a policy framed, originated, or born of the League. Like all other theories, it has been very gradually accepted; but, having sank deep into public opinion, has at last found energetic advocates, and, "as streams their channels deeper wear," has acquired more recently a rapid momentum; a national necessity, finally presenting the declivity which has precipitated it so suddenly, that comparatively few look back to its spring and source, or the unnoted advance it made in more distant years.

For all practical purposes we need not trace the theory to any more remote origin than the writings of Adam Smith, because they appeared at the time the great manufacturing power of England was beginning to rise in that form which has since swelled to such gigantic dimensions, converting villages into thickly-peopled cities, whose hands must be occupied that their mouths may be fed. The facts and evidence from which that theory was educed, must, of course, have been gathered from the ages preceding that of the writer, who first, or among the first, gave form and expression to it. Being broached, it gradually made its way, not rapidly, but through long years, even generations, of apparent neglect; still the seed was sown, and in due time germinated. Its first fruits were the measures of Mr. Huskisson, which, compared with our present legislation, were as the timid steps of the child to the confident pace of the man; but he established the precedent, he broke through the barriers, and gave the first shock to the principle of Protection. His measures, limited as they were, nevertheless met with violent opposition, and were assailed with loud and frequent prophecies of ruin and destruction to all the interests affected by them. But time wore on, and neither the ruin nor the destruction came; men inquired more deeply into the question, upon which more light began to fall through the breaches made in the older system. The subsequent discussions of Protection were chiefly confined to the question of the Corn-laws, which the continual embarrassment and distress of the Landed Interest, as continually brought before the Legislature.

From the close of the war, down to the present time, the Law has been almost perpetually undergoing alteration, always with the object of securing a remunerative price to the grower, and at almost every change, lowering that standard of price, and diminishing the former amount of protection. The quantity of legislation that has been spent on this one subject since the beginning of the last century, would appear incredible to those who have not traced it through the records of Parliament. The failure of any plan was only followed by the proposal of another quite as complex, which again broke down beneath the pressure of circumstances; the Legislature, in its anxiety to secure agriculture from the competition of the distant foreigner, overlooked the effect of competition of county with county at home, which, in years of abundance, frequently produced a fall in prices far below the standard the Law was enacted to preserve. But it was long before the confidence of statesmen in the system was shaken; men who recognised Protection as an erroneous system when applied to manufactures, believed corn, as food, to be an exception; and it is certain that the earnestness with which the Corn-laws were, and are, supported, proceeded from a sincere conviction that they are the best and only means of furnishing the people with an abundant and regular supply of provisions. The sweeping charge of selfishness that has been so often brought against its advocates we firmly believe to be an unjust one. On the same ground they are supported now—as may be seen from the speech of Mr. Liddell, on Tuesday evening. No men, or set of men, could venture to defend any system of laws by the bare avowal that they personally gained by it. It is the belief that they really are good and wise in themselves, joined to fears of the consequences of parting with them, that makes the defence so formidable. To the mind that sees millions of acres abandoned to weeds and barrenness, and thousands of men deprived of employment, as the result of relinquishing them, the prospect is appalling enough; and men, who, on other branches of commercial policy, were in advance of their time—men like Mr. Huskisson and Sir H. Parnell—were strong advocates of a restricted importation of Corn. The difficulty of escaping from the convictions formed during a whole life is excessive: thus it is that generations pass ere an opinion begins to influence the policies that govern mankind.

Passing over all the changes which it was found requisite to make in the law of 1815, and as summarily dismissing the proposal of a Fixed Duty by the Whigs, when they were utterly powerless, and unable to carry anything, we come to the year 1842, and that commencement of the policy of relaxation by which it was distinguished. Those who call the present change sudden and unexpected must have forgotten much that took place in the memorable debates of that and the subsequent years. All the other changes had been only variations of the system; this was accompanied by a departure from it. As to Corn, protection was diminished; as to other articles, prohibitive duties were abolished, and protective duties relaxed. Whether, during that sad period of commercial depression and national distress, which darkened the decline and fall of the Whig Government, and continued during the two first years of that which succeeded it, the Premier had studied more deeply the causes of such vicissitudes, and thus been led to modify some former opinions, or at least to doubt their soundness, cannot be known; certain it is, his measures were the beginning of a freer policy. His speeches, then and afterwards, are now remarkable for the many passages they contain, in which he intimated future advances in the same direction; and it is impossible to doubt but that he then contemplated doing so, should his partial experiment answer his expectations. Guarded concessions of the abstract truth of the theory of Free-Trade—defences of departures from it only on the ground that they could be proved to be for the benefit of the whole community—expositions of the theory that high duties often defeat their object, and diminish the revenue—refusals to declare that agriculture should be exempted from the operation of the principles applied to other branches of industry—all these and more may be found in the speeches of Sir Robert Peel between 1842 and 1845. "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear." Some of his party took alarm, and became suspicious; but on many of them, even now, the present plan has come like an unexpected shock. To us it seems that Sir Robert Peel but continues the work he then began; and he avows that it is the success of that partial experiment which induces him to carry it still further. The great change must have taken place before 1842; it is not wholly the result of the circumstances of the past autumn. That he did not so openly avow that change, or at so early a period as could be wished, must be allowed. To his personal influence that silence will be injurious; between him and his party that reserve—perhaps the harsher name of equivocation might be used—may be a subject of reproach; but if the policy increases the welfare of the people at large, they will readily pardon the departure from consistency which has attended its adoption. If rulers were inexorably barred from all change of measures or opinion—were to be bound in perpetuity by declarations made in imperfect knowledge to persist in courses shown by after experience to be wrong—all government would become impossible. But we have touched upon this question elsewhere.

For the Plan itself, we may shortly state that it generally resembles that of 1842; like that, it deals with the two great articles—Corn and Timber; but now, instead of a mere lessening of protection on the first, a prospective abolition of it is proposed: as to the second, it seems that the duty is to be gradually reduced, the process to be spread over a number of years. There is again a total abolition of duties on some kinds of produce, on cattle, and fresh and salt provisions; and a partial reduction of duties upon others. Among those articles on which the duties are to be totally abolished are coarse linens, woollens, and cottons; this is to prove that there shall be strict impartiality between "Tyrian and Trojan," had manufacturing protection remained untouched, the agriculturists would have complained of unfair dealing; and it besides serves as a test of the sincerity of the declarations of the Free-Traders that they are for Free-Trade in all things.

As to the articles on which the duties are merely reduced, no new principle is propounded; their increased consumption at the lower rate, it is expected, as in other cases, will make up the revenue in the course of time. The reductions on Silks and Brandy are the most important, and may serve to show France that no national jealousies have excluded her products; the same may be said of the insertion in this list of Hats, Boots, and Ribbons.

But the present plan includes something which the last did not—a series of what are called compensations to the Landed Interest. These are—a saving of the highway-rates, by putting the roads under the control of district boards, instead of leaving them to each separate parish—a relief of the county rates from the expense of maintaining prisoners in gaol, and of prosecutions—a part payment by the Government of the medical officers and schoolmasters of Unions—a change in the Law of Settlement, which will prevent many paupers from being removed from manufacturing towns to rural districts—and the establishment of a system of loans by the Treasury, on security, to the proprietors of entailed estates, destitute of capital, for the purpose of improving their land. All these changes—with the exception of the last—will be partial public benefits, and we do not anticipate much opposition to them; but the beginning the loan system will, we fear, be mischievous; the scandalous jobbing and profligacy that have been created in Ireland by a similar system, ought to warn us how we establish it here, unless accompanied with the most rigorous restrictions, and summary powers of recovering the amount.

The abolition of the duties on Indian Corn, Maize, and Oil-cake will be of some advantage to the agriculturists. The change is based on the same principle on which other duties have been abolished on imported produce. These articles may be considered as the raw materials of the farmer's manufacture; they create no competition and afford him additional means of feeding stock. On the whole, the plan is a bold one for a Minister in Sir Robert Peel's position, as it fixes the day on which the Corn-laws are to cease and determine. But it is not complete or satisfactory; it has too much of the middle course about it. The Protectionists cannot support it; the extreme among the Free-Traders will not, as they are pledged against any compromise. If, from both sides of the House, moderate men enough can be found to carry it against the ultras of each party, still it is almost hopeless that the Lords will agree to it. Then comes the dissolution, and on the verdict of the people at large will the settlement of the great question depend.

PEEL AND THE TARIFF.

I.

To do his duty was to every man
Our Nelson's mandate, and he was no juggler;
To "do the duty," on the other hand,
Is ever the ambition of the Smuggler.
Peel, if as Nelson bold, as smuggler 'cute, is,
For it is certain he has done the duties!

II.

Such a repealing!—Peel is a Repealer
More than O'Connell, in the literal sense;
Expediency persuades him to the mood,
And then his resolution is intense!
Even Government cannot avoid his nabbing it,
For when he re-took he re-Peel'd the Cabinet!

III.

Off with the duties! Going! going! going!
Peel strikes the hammer, and behold them gone!
The Premier's look, too, is so very knowing,
As foes and farmers he looks down upon!
He seems to say—Free-Trade is my election,
You are beneath and I'm above Protection.

IV.

'Tis a tremendous Tariff he has brought
To give the Nation's brains a week of suction,
To common sense reduce it as you ought,
And still you won't reduce its great reduction!
Again Peel shouts, "I've got you all, my beauties;
I've done my duty—and I've done the duties!"

V.

If Juries seek his shop, as Juries do
Seek other shops through England and through Wales,
They'll bring his measures under their review;
Accuse him, p'raps, of having sliding scales!
Then make a bow, declaring for the State
That all his measures have uncommon weight!

VI.

Corn-Law is sold, and almost out of bin:
At its condition now the people laugh;
They'll make their Cheap-bread Champions bring it in.
Peel's double-thrashed it all and kept the chaff!
Three years it pines, enfeebled with fatigue,
Then breathes its last to Bobby and the League!

VII.

Sugar's to go—not in the lump indeed,
But something will be taken off "tout-sweet!"
Rice and a thousand little things we need;
And Brandy will be cheaper—that's a treat!
There's hardly a domestic thing one handles
That will not fall—including Soap and Candles!

VIII.

Butter—the duty is to come off pat!
We dare to pound it, that will suit us all.
For something cheap you'll get a Paris hat;
And Foreign boots and shoes too will sing small—
Tanners will save some tanners on their hides—
And there is lots of pleasant news besides.

IX.

Silk! O ye wives and daughters, look alive—
Hurrah for bonnets and for gowns galore!
Peel is a popular man—with him you thrive:
Russell to Silk would never ope the door:
Dresses that set uneasy round the bustle,
Will wonder how they condescend to Russell!

X.

In Carriage sit—on Brussels Carpet tread—
Oh wealthy fair! at half your former cost.
Adorn the person—decorate the head;
Sing, "All is Gain'd!" instead of, "All is Lost!"
Turn on Protection your indignant heel,
And dance into the arms of Premier Peel!

XI.

My patient pauper, too, rejoice—even thou,
Tho' we admit you are not very fat,
You've only had a parish until now,
Now you've a settlement—remember that
Henceforth of workhouse you will have less knowledge,
And Government shall send your babes to college!

XII.

Glad rich! glad poor! cheap brandy and cheap bread!
Shoes, boots, and butter—hats, and soap, and cheese
Are thine henceforth! Is Gratitude gone dead?
Gods! that they should not shout for such as these;
But crow thy must—they will—they can they do!
Peel and the Tariff—Cock-a-Doodle-Do!

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE

The Paris Papers, of course, devote considerable space, as well as attention, to her Majesty's speech from the throne, which was received in Paris by express at an early hour on Friday (last week). The papers, generally, speak in favourable terms of it. The Débats approves highly of that portion of it in which further reforms in the Custom-house Tariff are announced. It expresses its admiration of the doctrines of Free-Trade, and says that the Queen of England is quite correct in stating that the repeal of the prohibitive laws and the reduction of protective duties within the last few years have been sufficiently justified by the increase in trade and consumption. The Débats adds that the English Cabinet is evidently influenced by the consideration that a Government, in its commercial relations with other countries, should look only at the revenue, and not make laws to protect this or that branch of industry.

The debates in the Chamber of Deputies on the Address drag their slow length along, and are actually not yet concluded, although it is at least a fortnight since the session was opened. They certainly do not order these things better in France. To the paragraph respecting railways, M. Grandin moved the following amendment:—"The Chamber has beheld with grief the abuses which have taken place relative to railway transactions, and hopes that your Majesty's Government will adopt such measures as may be necessary to prevent their recurrence." After a long discussion, the amendment was rejected by a majority of 49, the numbers being—for the amendment 160, against it 209. M. Darblay then gave notice of another amendment, nearly similar to that of M. Grandin.

The Journal des Chemins de Fer publishes the following letter, addressed to it by Messrs. Mackenzie and Brassey, the contractors for the Rouen and Havre Railroad, on the subject of the accident to the viaduct of Barentin:—"We beg to inform you that we accept the entire responsibility of the accident, and intend to proceed with the re-construction as soon as possible. Although we are not able to account exactly for the cause of the accident, we think it may be traced to the foundations of the piles, which, instead of being made of brick, as was intended in the original plan, were of stone, with the approbation of Mr. Locke. This change had been applied for by us, with a view of advancing the works, and fulfilling the engagements that we had entered into with the Company." The same paper, alluding to the reports about a falling in of a portion of the tunnel of Harfleur, says: "The heavy rain in the night of the 22nd had undermined the ground of the road for a length of about four metres. At ten in the morning the repairs were finished, and the circulation was never interrupted for an instant."

SPAIN.

Considerable excitement prevails in Madrid upon the subject of the proposed marriage of the Queen with Count Trappani. Indeed, the aspect of affairs almost indicates a coming revolution. It seems that about forty of the Ministerial members had agreed to forward a remonstrance to the Government against the marriage, but not more than ten had remained firm to their original purpose. These forty members had believed that Ministers, or at least a majority of them, would not be displeased at such a manifestation. They were, however, disappointed. The Ministers declared that they would give no explanation on the subject, and Narvaez added, that if the Chamber showed any manifestation of opposition, he would dissolve it. A Cabinet Council was held on the subject on the 20th inst., and it was decided that the threat of Narvaez should be carried into effect if the deputies persevered in their intention.

It is supposed that the marriage, though quite determined on, will not take place for some time yet.

The Madrid papers mention the death of a former distinguished Minister, Don José Calatrava, who, after the late Augustin Argueles, was one of the most prominent and influential of the old Progressista party. Don José Maria Calatrava, who had been in a declining state for some time, and who laboured under a complication of mental and bodily suffering, expired suddenly, and the corpse was conveyed for interment to the cemetery of San Nicolas, situated half a mile outside the gate Atocha. He was in the 66th year of his age. The latter years of Senor Calatrava's life were passed in strict retirement.

(From our own Correspondent.)

LISBON, Jan. 10.

The weather here is magnificent—a summer at New Year's Day! The opening of the Cortes on the 2d inst. was a scene of great splendour. The Queen and the Empress of Brazil exhibited their usual contrast of appearance—the former being simply attired, and the latter a blaze of diamonds; the former twenty stone, and the latter eight stone weight! The King, with his father, Duke Ferdinand, and his brother, Prince Leopold of Saxe-Coburg, a prominent aspirant to the hand of the Queen of Spain, appeared in very splendid uniforms; and the Ministers in robes of ermine and brilliant stars, with which their mean physiognomies absurdly contrasted.

One of the most extraordinary musicians in Europe is now performing, nightly, at the Café de Bernardo, on the Caes do Sodré. He may be called the "Guitarist Paganini." He is blind, but his physiognomy bears a striking resemblance to the magical violinist, especially en profile. His hair is likewise worn with the same wild redundancy. His enthusiasm and depth of feeling, during performance, make his countenance appear beautiful, though naturally almost ugly, and deeply pitted with the small-pox. His executive, whilst confining a single passage, the overtures and favourite morceaux from all the leading operas. He can also dwell upon the notes, and make them "weep," as it is termed, in performing an aria, better, probably, than any player in existence, and has pushed the powers of this limited instrument to a degree of cultivation unprecedented. He is a native of Lisbon, and was precluded from his birth from reading a note of music.

Horse-racing, upon a small scale, has been recently introduced here at Campo Grande, but with little success.

No poem of modern times has produced a greater sensation than Mr. Hughes' "Dream Flowers," which the inhabitants of Madeira, where the scene is laid, have received with enthusiastic ardour. The local journals team with sonnets and "tributes of admiration" to the author, substantive poems of commendation have likewise been separately issued, the most striking of which is by the French Consul. The Municipal Chamber of Funchal has met to record its sense of the accuracy and beauty with which the magnificent scenery of the island, its chivalrous history and legends, have been described in the prose and poetical portions of the work, and an address of thanks from the Municipality, conceived in terms of the most exalted praise, has been forwarded to the author. But the enthusiasm did not reach its height, until the principal island newspaper, the Imparcial, on the 13th December, appeared, under the extraordinary circumstances of devoting its entire space, sixteen columns, with the exception of about twenty lines, to editorial notices and poems enlogistic of this work.

Since the receipt of the above, Lisbon letters to the 22nd inst. have reached us. The discussion on the reports of the committees about the elections had continued to the day the packet sailed, and was likely to last for some days longer. The minority threatens to secede from the Chambers, after signing a protest. The financial state of the country shows no improvement. The Government was using every exertion to raise money. The Confiança Nationai, it is expected, will lend them as much as will relieve urgent claims

THE UNITED STATES.

We have New York papers to the 8th inst., by the packet ship, Henry Clay. The news by them is important, inasmuch as it appears that there have been some further fiery discussions about the Oregon territory. No less a personage than Mr. John Quincy Adams, a former President of the United States, has taken the field in opposition to England. On the 3rd inst., W. C. J Ingersoll, Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, addressed the House of Representatives on the Oregon question, in the course of which he observed that that territory was worth a war; he repudiated the idea of surrendering the north of the 49th parallel, as by doing so, they would lose the best half of that magnificent territory, and concluded his oration by declaring that he was for no war for Oregon if it could be avoided; if not, no peace while England has an inch of ground on American soil. Mr. Winthorp followed Mr. Ingersoll, and advocated, in able and energetic terms, the principles propounded in the resolutions he brought before the House on a former occasion. It seemed to him that it was a contest between two nations, for a territory to which neither had any exclusive right, and for which they were such asses as to go to war. The Committee on Foreign Relations have, by a very small majority, agreed to recommend the President to give notice of the termination of joint occupancy. The minority have reported their opinions on the subject to the House. Not content with having absorbed Texas, and making an effort to procure California, some of the American citizens have taken it into their heads to submit resolutions for the annexation of Ireland! No action was taken upon them, but they were read from the clerks.

Mr. Adams, in the course of his speech, said, "I am ready to give notice to Great Britain that we mean to terminate the treaty between us, and at the end of twelve months I am ready to take possession of the territory." War, he repeated, need not follow from the notice, or from occupation; they could negotiate still; and his belief was, he repeated again and again, that war would not be the consequence of the notice. But, if that came, he was sure that it would soon be terminated, and terminated in a manner for ever to prevent England from interfering with the United States.

Mr. Adams's speech created great sensation in the House, and the New Yorkers are anything but cooled down in consequence of it.

By this arrival we have details of another steam-boat disaster, and, as usual in America, attended with frightful loss of life. The steamer Belle Zane, while on her way from Zanesville, Ohio, to New Orleans, struck a snag about twelve miles below the mouth of White River, on the Mississipi, and immediately turned bottom up. It was about twelve o'clock of the 18th December when the accident occurred, and the night was bitter cold. Out of some 90 souls on board at the time upwards of 80 perished. A steamer named the Diamond came along a short time after the accident, and the officers picked up 16 of the passengers.

ALLEGED RESIGNATIONS.—The Morning Post contains reports of various alleged resignations of individuals, chiefly connected with the Household. It is right to add, however, that we have not seen any confirmation of these rumours. Among other resignations mentioned are those of the Marquis of Granby, Lord in Waiting to Prince Albert; and of the Earl of Hardwicke, Lord of the Bedchamber; also that of the Marquis of Exeter, Groom of the Stole to Prince Albert. Our contemporary states that Lord Arthur Lennox has resigned the office of Clerk of the Ordnance, and that Sir Thomas Fremantle, the Secretary for Ireland, has been appointed Chairman of the Commissioners of Customs.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.—It is currently rumoured in military circles that the army will be increased 14,000 men, by the addition of two companies to each infantry and two troops to each cavalry regiment. Three commissioned officers, a captain, and two subalterns will be appointed to each of these companies and troops.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

[The proceedings in the Houses of Lords and Commons on Monday and Tuesday, will be found in the Supplement.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The House met to-day at twelve o'clock, in pursuance of the arrangement which had been made

RETURN OF MR. O'CONNELL.—At about a quarter-past twelve Mr. O'Connell entered the House, and shook hands with most of the members on the Opposition side of the House, who received him with great cordiality.

AMENDMENT TO SIR HOWARD DOUGLAS'S MOTION.—Mr. COLQUHOUN gave notice that on the motion for the House to resolve into Committee on the Customs and Corn Importation Acts, he should move an amendment.

RAILWAY COMMITTEES.—Mr. GOULBURN moved several resolutions for amending the proceedings of Committees on Standing Orders on Railway Bills. The hon. gentleman explained the objects which he had in view, the principal of which were to allow a direct appeal to the House in the decision of questions of locality in certain cases, and to allow parties to be heard by Counsel before the Committee on Standing Orders upon points referred to them. He wished also to put an end to the system of secrecy which was at present observed in the Standing Orders Committee. —Lord G. SOMERSET opposed the propositions, which he apprehended would lead to increased delay and expense.—Mr. STRUTT also opposed the resolutions, which were received without a division.

PUBLIC WORKS IN IRELAND.—Sir T. FREMANTLE then moved the second reading of the Public Works (Ireland) Bill.—Mr. HUME said that he had looked carefully over the bill, and he found great difficulty in arriving clearly at its meaning. It would have been better to bring in a bill to repeal former acts, and re-enact the necessary provisions of them in one bill.—Sir T. FREMANTLE said that he perfectly concurred with the general observations of the hon. Member for Montrose, as regarded general alterations in the law; but these observations did not apply to the present bill. ("Hear, hear," from Mr. O'Connell.) The object of this bill was merely to give an additional grant of £8,000 for the construction of public works in Ireland.—Mr. O'CONNELL said that the observations of his hon friend the Member for Montrose would apply only to permanent laws—laws which were intended to be perpetual. This, however, was not intended to be a permanent law of that nature, as it was a particular act of Parliament to regulate the expenditure of a particular sum of money, of a very limited extent he would say, and the small sum for the purpose which it was proposed to offer by it. ("Hear, hear," from several Irish members.) He (Mr. O'Connell) would not oppose the bill—on the contrary, he would support it; but under the protest that the Government should not, by the introduction of the bill, be entitled to hold themselves discharged from the duty of providing against the distress which was to be expected in Ireland in a very short period. This bill was a small instalment of that relief for which the condition of Ireland was crying out. It was impossible to exaggerate the state of things produced in Ireland by the failure of the potato crop. Indeed, it was not too much to say that within three or four weeks a great portion of the population might be in a state of actual famine, if measures were not speedily adopted to avert that calamity. (Hear, hear.) After some further discussion, the motion was agreed to, and the House adjourned soon after two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY

THE CORN-LAWS.—Lord ASHBURTON presented petitions from Surrey and other parts, in favour of agricultural protection.—The Duke of RICHMOND presented similar petitions from Sussex, and also complaining of the unconstitutional proceedings of the League. The comprehensive scheme (as it was called) in another place was strongly condemned by the individuals who signed these petitions. They considered that the men who were about to violate their pledges should resign their seats. He perfectly agreed with them, and denied that there was any ground for repealing the Corn-laws. He trusted that the House would throw out the bill, and thus give the country the opportunity of giving an opinion upon the bill. The very men who now supported the measure at the last election voted against the 8s. duty. The men who now opposed such a measure were not those who had been bribed by the League.—Lord KINNAIRD defended the League, and said he was a member of it. It was extraordinary to hear an individual who belonged to a society which did the very same thing as the League, come forward and accuse that body of bribery. These same people created fictitious vots.s in Scotland. Men who live in glass houses should not throw stones. It was a Chartist doctrine to say that the House of Commons should not be tried first. The people of England would not submit to the continuance of the Poor-Law.—

Earl GREY said he regarded the measure in the other House with great satisfaction. He wished it had gone further, and that the whole thing had been proposed at once. He pronounced the modified sliding scale as a mere mockery (Hear,) He therefore could not understand upon what grounds it could be recommended. As a landowner he was afraid that the interval would dangerously continue all the evils with which a state of transition in commercial matters was always attended, and it would be difficult for landlords and tenants to come to an arrangement.

Lord ASHBURTON feared that neither the Government nor the House would even be able to carry out the principles of Free-Trade, as advocated by the Noble Earl, in a country placed in such a complicated position as this country was placed in. After some observations from Lord MONTEAGLE and Lord ASHBURTON, the subject dropped RAILWAY BUSINESS. The Earl of DALHOUSIE then rose to submit to their Lordships the plan which he proposed should be adopted with regard to Railway Bills. Several Peers joined in the discussion that followed. Lord BROUGHAM made some severe remarks on the general principles in which the business of the Railway Committees was conducted.—No opposition, however, was made to the motion, which was agreed to, and their Lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

Many petitions were presented, chiefly on the subject of the Corn-laws.

THE CORN-LAWS.—Mr BARING gave notice that, on Monday next, he would move the appointment of the committee on the Game-laws.

THE MILITIA.—Mr. DUNCOMBE said that a good deal of excitement and alarm existed as to the calling out of the militia in October next, and a great many clubs were formed in the country in consequence, and he was desirous of learning from the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Graham) if it was his intention to introduce a new bill to regulate it. Sir J. GRAHAM said that it was to be proposed that power should be given to her Majesty in Council to call out the militia on a fortnight's notice, if her Majesty's servants scoff deem that measure called for.

HARVEY DEPOSITE.—Mr. HARVEY said that he had to complain of the manner in which the railway deposits, amounting, he believed, this year to from eight to ten millions, were proposed to be placed in the hands of the Accountant-General of the Court of Chancery, and the delay which would take place before they were paid by him into the Bank of England, and the serious effect which that delay would produce on the commercial and monetary system of the country. The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said that he deplored as much as any man the difficulties which might be entailed on innocent persons, in consequence of the extensive railway speculations which had prevailed in the country; but he did not see that any alteration of the present law and orders of the House was called for or would be judicious. Mr. HUDSON said that the deposits were called for to secure the due execution of the works if the bills were passed; and he thought that security could be obtained as effectually at Lloyd's or bill, or other good securities, were lodged instead o. specie. (Cheers.) Sir. R. PEEL said he fully concurred in opinion with the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

FACTORY BILL.—Lord ASHLEY then moved for leave to bring in a bill to reduce the hours of working of young persons in factories to ten hours in the day. He prefaced his motion with a long address, containing numerous references to evidence taken on this question.—Mr. ROEBUCK declared against any legislative interference with labour, and charged the noble Lord with acting from false and mock humanity.—The motion was supported by Mr. Fielden, Mr. Wakley, and Mr. Newdegate, and leave was given to bring in the bill.

The remaining business was unimportant, and the House adjourned at a quarter past ten.

THE CASE OF LORD HUNTINGTOWER. In the Court of BANKRUPTCY on Tuesday an application was made by Mr. Cooke on behalf of Lord Huntingtower, for the purpose of granting him protection, as he had already been six months subjected to the annoyance of very many claimants. He had no wish unnecessarily to punish Lord Huntingtower, but he could not entertain any application like the present until the expiration of the next six months.

COUNTRY NEWS.

OPENING OF THE NORWICH GOVERNMENT SCHOOL OF DESIGN.—The formal opening of this institution took place last week. The rooms appropriated for the use of the students are a portion of the building in St. Andrew's, formerly erected for a bazaar, and are well adapted for the purpose. On the occasion they were filled with a highly respectable assembly. Sir John Boileau delivered an opening address.

ELECTION FOR THE WEST RIDING OF YORKSHIRE.—The nomination of a candidate or candidates for the representation of this riding, in the place of the present Lord Wharncliffe, has been officially announced for Wednesday next, the 4th of February. Edwin Lascelles) and Mr. Archer Gurney have been before the public for some days.

SUSSEX ELECTIONS.—A special County Court is to be held at Lewes, on Tuesday next, the 3d February, for the purpose of electing a member to represent the Eastern division of the county, in the room of Mr. Darby, there is no whisper of opposition to Mr. Frewen. At Midhurst, it is said a Mr. Walpole will be returned without opposition.

NEWARK ELECTION.—Mr. Stuart, Q.C., was on Thursday elected for the borough of Newark, in the room of Mr. Gladstone, who declined to offer himself again as a candidate.

THE MILITIA.—On Friday evening, a public meeting, at which there were upwards of a thousand persons present, was held at Chatham, for the purpose of taking into consideration the best means of promoting against the proposed enrolment of the militia. The greatest unanimity prevailed, and very strong feelings were manifested on the part of the audience against the proposed measure. A petition to the House of Commons, embodying these sentiments, was agreed to, and has already obtained numerous signatures.

MEETING AT GLOUCESTER AGAINST THE MILITIA. A meeting, convened by the Mayor, was held at the Shire Hall, Gloucester, on Monday evening, for the purpose of petitioning Parliament against the proposed enrolment of the militia. The meeting consisted of nearly 2000 persons, and was of a very enthusiastic character. Mr. Alderman Washbourn, in the absence of the Mayor, presided. The meeting was addressed by several gentlemen, who expressed the horrors of war, and denounced especially the system which had been adopted for organising the militia force. Resolutions of a corresponding character passed, and a petition adopted, which it was determined should lie for signatures in the town for some days preparatory to its being presented to the Legislature

EXPLOSION OF GUNPOWDER AT ARNOLD, NEAR NOTTINGHAM.—On Saturday last an explosion of gunpowder took place upon the premises of Mr. Edwin Garratt, grocer and druggist, of Arnold, four miles from Nottingham, which destroyed a large amount of property, and caused the death of Mr. George Garratt, the brother of Mr. Edwin Garratt. Mr. Rhodes, the occupier of the premises, the property of Mr. Rhodes, of Redhill, one of which was used as a retail shop, and the other as a warehouse for goods. Mr. Garratt (the deceased), who was ill and of unsound mind, was, at the time, lying in bed, in a chamber on the second floor of the warehouse, above which was a store-room, containing a considerable quantity of gunpowder. From some cause, this gunpowder exploded, and the whole house was blown to pieces, the timbers and bricks falling in a complete shower for a considerable distance all around. Mr. Garratt was in a lower room, and, on hearing the explosion, rushed out of the house, in time to escape injury from the falling ruins. His brother was absolutely blown out of his bed, into the street, where he was shortly afterwards extricated from the rubbish, and found to be severely burnt and bruised. He soon afterwards died. A framework-knitter, of the name of William Thompson, who happened to be passing at the moment, was also struck down, and covered by the falling mass. The injury done to the stock is estimated at £350, and to the buildings £400, all of which are uninsured. At the inquest the Jury returned, as their verdict—"That the deceased died in consequence of injuries he received by an explosion of gunpowder; that, by some means, he caused the said explosion; and that, at the same time, he appears to have been of unsound mind and understanding." Mr. Edwin Garratt, the brother of the deceased, and occupier of two of the houses destroyed, stated that the property was entirely uninsured, and that jury to the amount of £1,000 had been inflicted. Thompson, the other sufferer in the hospital, is recovering.

APPEARANCE OF THE COMET.—The Liverpool Courier says:—"The mildness of the present winter is a subject of general remark. We learn from the country that such is the temperature of the season that the thrush and others of the feathered tribe may be heard singing in some situations in the county of York and the neighbouring counties, on fine mornings, as they are usually heard in the early weeks of March and April. The winter wheats never looked more green or flourishing in January than at the present season, but the farmers and gardeners are beginning to wish for frost to check premature vegetation.

IRELAND.

CONVICTION FOR FIRING AT SIR FRANCIS HOPKINS.—Last week Bryan Seery was again tried for firing at Sir Francis Hopkins. The long panel was called over, and upwards of 100 gentlemen answered. After twenty challenges on the part of the prisoner, a highly respectable Jury, the greater portion landowners, was sworn. The proceedings were essentially similar to those on the first trial, on the previous day, when the jury could not agree. After a consultation of four hours the Jury returned a verdict of "Guilty," and the prisoner was on Saturday sentenced to death by Lord Chief Baron Brad;

ANOTHER ATTEMPT AT ASSASSINATION.—On Thursday evening (last week), Mr. Hugh Hanbury, of Rathmoylon, in the county of Meath, was fired at by an unknown assassin, who lay concealed behind a hedge, on the public road, and within 40 perches of Mr. Hanbury's residence. A reward of £100 has been offered by the Government, for the discovery of the perpetrator of the outrage. It is a melancholy coincidence, that this lawless act was committed on the very day that the gentry of the county had assembled together for the laudable purpose of devising measures for the permanent amelioration of the labouring classes. A proclamation has also been issued, offering a like reward for the apprehension of the murderers of Mr James Lynch, who was shot dead, in the county of Limerick, on the 19th inst

DEATH OF THE HON. CAPTAIN W. KEITH, R.N.—We have to notice the decease of the above gallant captain, who expired a few days since at Monkrigg, near Haddington, N.B. The honourable captain was second and only surviving son of William, seventh Earl of Kintore

ACCOUNTS from WARSAW, published in a Frankfort paper, state that the news from the Caucasus comes down to the 20th of December, and that the Circassians had taken and destroyed, in a night attack, the forts on the left wing of the Russian army. The Russian garrisons consisting of between 1200 and 1300 men, had been partly cut to pieces, and partly carried away as prisoners to to the mountains.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

SUICIDE OF A STRANGE SORT OF A GIRL.—On Tuesday, Mr. Wakley, M.P., held an inquest at the University College Hospital on the body of Annabella Perry, aged twenty-one, late cook in a family residing in Huntley-street, Tottenham-court-road. Jane Perry, sister and fellow servant of deceased, said the latter went out on Saturday evening last to make some purchases, as she said. She remained out two hours and a half, and, returning at nine o'clock, she went without saying a word upstairs to her bed-room. Not descending to the kitchen, in half an hour the witness went to look for her, and found her suspended by the neck from the bed-post by a black silk handkerchief. An alarm was raised, the body was cut down, and a surgeon was in attendance with all possible dispatch, but their attempts to save life were useless. "She was a strange sort of girl," the sister said, "and used to ask every young man she saw to marry her" Her last earliest youth she was very giddy, flighty, and fond of talking ridiculous nonsense. A year ago she had attempted to hang herself, but the rope broke. Verdict, "Temporary insanity."

THE LATE ACCIDENT ON THE SOUTH EASTERN RAILWAY.—The inquiry into the late disastrous accident on this line was resumed on Monday, at Tonbridge. Mr. Barlow and some other witnesses having been examined, the Coroner put some questions to that gentleman as to General Pasley's opinion of the accident. Mr. Barlow at once replied that General Pasley's opinion entirely coincided with his own. The General remarked that "it was an untoward event, which no force, it could have anticipated." The Jury retired for two hours, and on their return, the Foreman read the following as the unanimous finding of himself and brother jurors:—"We find that James Dobie was killed in consequence of the falling of a bridge, called Johnson's-bridge, in this parish, by reason of the foundation of the said bridge being undermined and washed away by an unexpected flood of water; and in the opinion of the Jury it is a dangerous practice to make drains under arches, as it tends to weaken the foundation; and the Jury consider the small hole, alluded to in the evidence adduced, is too near the line of railway." The verdict was accompanied by a nominal deodand of 1s. on the engine and tender.

COLLISION ON THE GREAT NORTH OF ENGLAND RAILWAY.—An accident occurred to the mail train proceeding north, on Friday evening (last week), near the Lessay station, on the Great North of England Railway. The train was rather earlier than usual, and was going at the rate of about ten miles an hour past the station, when another train was discovered in advance on the same line, and though the steam was put off instantly, and the break applied, a violent collision took place, which broke the engines, damaged several of the carriages, and injured a number of the passengers. One lady was much cut about the head and face, and one gentleman received a severe blow on the leg. It appears that the train run into was a coal train on the wrong line, it being changing from one to the other when the mail train was observed coming, and as the coal train could not be got out of the way in time, the engineman put on the steam, and pushed it along in advance of the mail train, so as to afford the latter an opportunity of stopping as soon as the obstruction was discovered.

CIVIL WAR ON THE THAMES.

O, Father Thames! thy Sons and Guns
Are making quite a row now:
The Isle they call the Isle of Dogs
Ne'er bark'd up such a bow wow!
If you are good, and in the mood,
We'll tell you, reader, how now!
'Twas brought to bear
By the great Lord Mayor.

You know that he's obliged to see
A precious lot of company—
Ay, every size and sort o' men;
But the Watermen's Co.
Is with him no go;
And it's not his measure
To "request the Pleasure
Of the Company of Watermen."

Well, without suit or summons,
He shorten'd their Commons,
And cut off their piers shorter still—as is known!
So they just sent him word
That, as he was a Lord,
They'd be after creating a pier of their own.

This practical chaff
They perform'd at Paul's Wharf
They typed a brave house for the bibing of beer there;
Chain'd barges together,
For foul or fair weather,
And you soon saw appear a most beautiful pier there!

Of, ay! quite as much use as the pier at Blackfriars,
So they said—but his Lordship declared they were liars.
All men thought the Mayor seized with a pain in his liver,
So prompt was his fashion
Of proving his passion,
And from that moment forth there was war on the river!

Now we give the tittle tattle
Of a most important battle.
Mayor well set for the row—he roars
To the Watermen he floors,
Flabbergasters, grieves and gulls,
If he cannot break their oars,
He at least will crack their skulls!

He collects his warlike brothers,
"Mudlarks, dredgermen, and others," ("Mudlarks!" shout the boys at play,
"Pray what sort of larks are they?")
City Peelers, drilled enough
To get their choler up to cuff;
All together, mixed like gravy,
Form a sort of Lord Mayor's navy;
These, with many more in full,
Board the steamer call'd St. Michael,
And, with many "ha's" and "hems" O!
Sally forth upon the Thames O!
With a Water-Bailiff bore
Acting there as commodore!

Do we hear
They take the Pier?
No such luck, Lord Mayor, we fear—
They are off,
The prime Paul Wharf,
Which to capture they may strive O!
But they're met by Waterman 5 O!—
Hardy—bandy—and all alive O!

Water-Bailiff's luck enlarges—
Lord Mayor's Fleet has won the Barges;
But ere it can save that bacon,
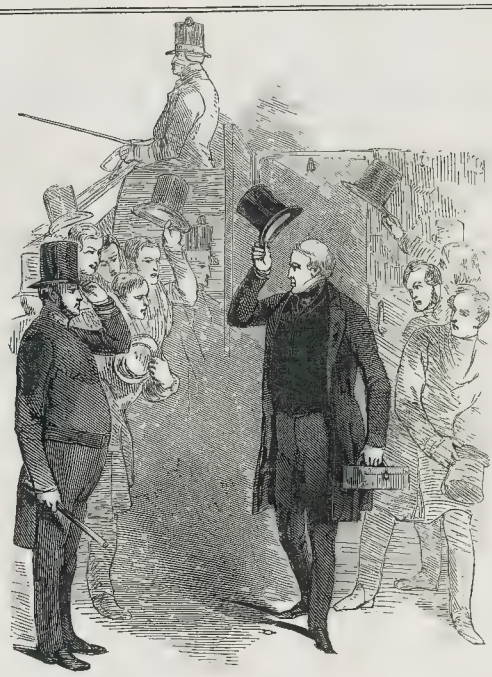
Water-Bailiff's luck declines—
All the Barges are re-taken:
Water-Bailiff looking gravely—
No. 5 behaving bravely,
And of triumph showing signs.

Soon the Water-Bailiff roar'd in,
"Peelers, pipe all hands for boardin'."
Lord Mayor's troops are all alive—
Boarded in number 5.
But the crew
Are very few—
What can the policemen do?
Draw their truncheons—give a topper
To the boy what won't cry "Stop her!"
Bludgeon one who won't cry "Ease her!"
To assist their wish to seize her;
And the helmsman's work to stop,
Bruise his fingers till they drop.
Pretty sailors, these! No matter:
Now no more they bruise and batter.

For that jolly down-stairs joker,
Whom they designate the stoker,
Shouts up to his Peeler foes,
"Steam my hearties, off it is ...



ARRIVAL OF SIR ROBERT PEEL AT THE HOUSE OF COMMONS, ON TUESDAY LAST.—(SEE SUPPLEMENT.)

Spitting, sparkling, whizzing, scalding,
If your truncheons are not haul'd in!"

This a settler! off they go,
With the barges now in tow;
Come my Lord Mayor's Fleet, "gee woe!"
Will his Lordship now give quarter,
Think ye, to the men of water?
No, again his wrath o'ercharges,
He will not give up the barges;
Watermen, then, "to it" fall,
And retaking one and all,
Tow them back to wharf of Paul!

Where—for they are now the Pier,
You may see them reader dear,
Watermen around them standing;
Laughing passengers a-landing,
Crowds the Lord Mayor's fleet a-branding,
Shouting loud and fast and free
For Paul's Wharf, Pier, and Company!

CIVIL WAR IN THE CITY.

It will be recollected that the Waterman's Steam Packet Company were deprived by the Navigation Committee of the use of the Blackfriars Free Pier, erected by the City authorities on the site of the old Waterman's pier. The directors of the Waterman's Company having been deprived of the use of the "free pier," were compelled to procure another landing place as near the old pier as possible, and accordingly took a lease of the premises known as Paul's-wharf, belonging to a poor woman named Needham, the widow of a free waterman. A pier was constructed to draw in and out with the rise and fall of the tide, thereby preventing anything like an obstruction of the river. After several attempts of persons in the employ of the City authorities to prevent the barges from being moored in their proper positions, the pier was put in order on Wednesday (last week), and the arrangements being complete it was taken in in the evening, and moored near the wharf.

On Wednesday night, at a late hour, the presence of the City Solicitor and other officers of the Corporation at St. Paul's-wharf gave intimation that something extraordinary was to be done. Before day-break on Thursday morning, the St. Michael steam towing-vessel, carrying a great number of the City police, dredgermen, fishermen, and some of the most desperate characters on the river approached. They acted under the directions of Saunders and Pearce, the water-bailiffs, who were armed with a warrant from the Lord Mayor. The Waterman's Company were not unprepared. Their strongest steamer, No. 5, had her steam up, and was moored near the wharf. An attempt was first made by the Lord Mayor's men to remove a barge on which a gangway leading from the shore was fixed. The Waterman No. 5, lay before it and prevented this design being carried into effect. Another barge, however, was forcibly torn away by the St. Michael, and towed into the stream. The chains by which it was made fast were broken. The St. Michael then returned for the purpose of removing another barge moored to Messrs. Crawshay's iron wharf. This was accomplished by breaking the chains in two. The two barges were then taken in tow by the St. Michael for the purpose of being conveyed to the Commercial Dock, at Rotherhithe. The Waterman steamer, No. 5, was drawn across the playing-place, and every obstacle was thrown in the way of the deputy water-bailiffs and their men. By the time the barges were removed, it was day-light, and vast numbers were assembled on both shores to witness the engagement. The St. Michael no sooner began to tow the barges away, than Waterman No. 5 was steered head on, with great violence, between the tug and the barges, and they were broken adrift. The St. Michael attempted to recover them, and take them in tow again, but was outmanœuvred by the Waterman, and the barges, steamers, and some boats attending upon them, went round and round and athwart the tide several times. The Lord Mayor's force, however, was the strongest, and the St. Michael took the barges in tow again. The Waterman once more went head first between the barges and the St. Michael, but did not succeed in separating them. The Waterman then laid herself athwart hawse of the St. Michael, going round and round for more than half an hour amidst tremendous shouts from the people on both shores. Every successful manœuvre of the Watermen was loudly cheered. On the contrary, the Lord Mayor's men and City police were groaned at and hissed. The St. Michael could not get away from the Waterman, and Mr. Pearce gave directions to the City police and some Bankside dredgermen to board her. This was soon done, as there was no one on board the Waterman, besides the crew, who could offer any effectual resistance. The crew, however, refused to give up possession of the vessel, on which the policemen made an attack upon them, and beat them with their staves. The man at the helm refused to give up possession, and the police battered his fingers and made him let go of the wheel, to which a Bankside waterman was appointed. The call-boy was knocked down by a policeman, because he obeyed the directions of Mr. Kinchin, the master, and called out "Go on a-head." Pearce then gave directions to three of the police to go into the engine-room, and draw the fires out. The engineer threatened to let the steam off and scald them if they came below, and they desisted. The St. Michael once more got the pier-barges in tow, and, after another skirmish between the police and the crew of the Waterman, she was moored close to the coal-barges on the south shore. A number of coal-porters and others volunteered to expel the City police and the Lord Mayor's men, and they made a speedy retreat, amidst the groans of the people who witnessed their violence. The steamer narrowly escaped going athwart the abutments of Southwark-bridge while the police had possession of her. The crew of the Waterman having again obtained possession of the vessel, gave chase to the St. Michael, and overtook her in one of the arches of London-bridge. She went in between the tug and the barges, head first, at full speed, and drove them all towards Billingsgate. The Lord Mayor's men finding the crew of the Waterman were determined to recapture the barges, towed them into the roadstead, off the Custom-house, where they were moored. The Waterman was about to drag them away, when Saunders, one of the water-bailiffs, assured Mr. Kinchin they should not be taken to any other place until he had received further instructions from the Lord Mayor; on this representation they were allowed to remain where they were. The Lord Mayor, refusing to restore the barges to the Waterman's Company, two of their steamers, with a number of men on board, armed with hatchets, for the purpose of cutting away any chains or ropes, went on Friday morning to the Custom-house, and forcibly took possession of the barges and towed them away in triumph. The Lord Mayor's men in charge of the barges were so terrified that they offered no resistance, and ran away. The pier was again formed at St. Paul's-wharf on Friday, and to prevent the Lord Mayor's men again dragging it away, it was guarded by two of the Waterman's steamers during the day, and no fewer than seven steamers of the Waterman's Company during the night. This has been continued ever since, and men have been stationed on London and Southwark bridges to fire signals in the event of any hostile steam-tug again approaching. The Waterman's Steam Packet Company have made up their minds to resist force by force until a court of law has decided on the legality of the Lord Mayor's proceedings.

The superintendent of the Waterman's Steam Packet Company, accompanied by Mr. Hancock of the Citizen Steam Boat Company, waited upon the Lord Mayor on Friday, and represented to him that the new pier at St. Paul's-wharf would be a great accommodation to the public, and that it was moored in a part of the river where it could not be any impediment to the navigation. They also pointed out to his Lordship that the Blackfriars pier extended much farther into the river, and that the numerous piers in the neighbourhood at London-bridge had been allowed to remain for years, in a crowded part of the stream, unmolested.

His Lordship refused to give his assent to the pier remaining where it was, and said it should be removed.

The applicants then said, if his Lordship was inclined to act impartially, he would remove the Corporation pier at Blackfriars and the floating piers at London-bridge.

The Lord Mayor declined making any promise to that effect, and the deputation left him.

The Waterman Steam-packet Company intend to petition both Houses of Parliament on the subject, and to call upon the Government to take the conservancy of the river out of the hands of the Corporation of London.

On Tuesday, at the Mansion House, the Lord Mayor observed that he felt regret at seeing some remarks, in part of the press, on the subject of the existing differences between the Corporation and the Waterman's Company, calculated to excite those who resisted the authorities to further and more violent breaches of the peace. The Waterman's Company knew well that they might, if they agreed to the regulations laid down for the public accommodation, ply at the pier at Blackfriars-bridge; but, the fact was, that Company wanted to establish a monopoly, and the City authorities, influenced by a desire to serve the public alone, would not submit.

"CIVIL WAR" ON THE THAMES, BETWEEN THE WATERMEN AND CITY AUTHORITIES.

OPENING OF THE VICENZA AND VENICE RAILWAY.

THE VICENZA AND VENICE RAILWAY.

The Railroad between Vicenza and Venice was opened on the 11th inst. The principal feature of this line is of course the bridge or viaduct, crossing the Laguna Veneta, which commences at the Punta della Sacca, on the island of St. Lucia, and terminates at the Barena di St. Giuliano, where the Railroad on the mainland begins. The soil in which the foundation of the viaduct is laid is almost all marshy, covered by the water of the ordinary high tides, which near Venice is 180 metres in depth, and at St. Giuliano becomes so shallow as to have scarcely any depth at all. Consequently, even at low water, the marsh is to half its extent covered; but in high tides, or storms, the waters rise about 120 metres above the level of the sea, and then the passage across the Lagune becomes difficult or impracticable. In bad weather the violence of the waves is such that great difficulties had to be overcome in laying the foundations; the fury of the wind sometimes destroying in an hour the work of the preceding days. By skill and precaution, however, they have been successfully overcome. The base of the works terminates at the height above the level, at which the spring of the arches commences; it is built of the stone of Istria, joined with Roman cement; the height of this basement is 26 metres above the level of the sea. All the upper works are of brick. The bridge contains 222 arches, divided into six compartments of 37 arches each, and one much larger in the centre. The whole length is 12,000 English feet. The breadth of the roadway is sufficient to allow two trains to pass. The architectural character of the work is Roman. The style of the parapet is antique, massive where it rests upon the arches, and terminating in open column work. By the side of the parapets, and on the level of the road, many pipes are laid which are to be connected with the great aqueduct in progress for bringing fresh water from Sile to Venice. In laying the foundation 80,000 piles of larch-wood were driven; in the whole of the works there were 30,000 cubic metres of earth excavated, while there were employed as materials, 7000 cubic metres of rubble, 110,000 kilogrammes of iron, 21,000,000 of bricks, and 5000 cubic metres of Istrean stone; four years were required to complete the structure, and about a thousand men were daily employed upon it. The first plan was laid down by Signor Milani, an architect and engineer, but many improvements were subsequently introduced by the acting engineer of the works Signor L. Duodo; they were also superintended by Signor A. Noale. Great credit is due to the contractor and builder, Antonio Busetto of Palestrina, for the style in which he has performed his task; it is said he has derived a good profit from the undertaking. The total cost is 5,600,000 lire (Austrian) or £186,667 sterling.

Thus is Venice, the ocean city, at last chained by modern enterprise to the mainland; no future Rogers will be able to describe the approach to it as he has done in words now rendered a tradition:

> There is a glorious city in the sea.
> The sea is in the broad and narrow streets,
> Ebbing and flowing, and the salt sea-weed
> Clings to the marble of the palaces.
> No track of men, no footsteps to and fro
> Lead to her gates. The path lies o'er the sea
> Invisible; and from the land we went
> As to a floating city—steering in
> And gliding up her streets, as in a dream,
> So smoothly, silently—by many a dome,
> Mosque-like, and many a stately portico,
> The statues ranged along an azure sky;
> By many a pile in more than Eastern pride,
> Of old—the residence of merchant Kings.

How changed is now the approach so beautifully described? "The path lies o'er the sea" still, it is true, but no more "invisible," or noiseless. It lies along the "ringing groves" traversed with scream and rattle by that modern enchanter to whose power neither ocean nor mountain can oppose an obstacle. The Romance that lingered over Venice has received a shock; she is reduced to the "dull catalogue" of common cities, reached by the same unpicturesque means. But these are great compensations; the beauty of decay and isolation is very well for poets to write about, but those who live in the midst of them prefer the bustle and prosperity of trade, and if anything can raise Venice above her present condition, it is the completion of her Railroad.

The first trial of the line took place on the 6th inst., and on the 11th it was opened in form. The authorities of the city, accompanied by a select party, with music &c., started in a train at half-past ten in the morning for Vicenza; at Padova they were joined by the authorities of that town; the party thus augmented went on to Vicenza, and after partaking of a sumptuous breakfast in the Campo Marti, they returned to Venice. The distance is thirty-six miles, and the time occupied in performing it was two hours going, and one hour returning. The trains will run three times a day, returning to Venice and stopping at Padova and four other intermediate stations. The fares are, first-class 5s. 6d.; second ditto 4s. 4d.; third ditto 2s. 8d.

IMPORTANT NEWS FROM THE RIVER PLATE.

(From a Correspondent.)

DEFEAT OF GENERAL ROSAS BY THE ENGLISH AND FRENCH TROOPS.

The Cyclops has arrived at Plymouth, from Rio Janeiro, which place she left on the23rd of December, and brings the important news of a desperate action on the 20th of November, between the combined English and French forces, and the troops of General Rosas, on the river Paraná, at the Vuelto del Obligado. The Cyclops left Rio on the morning of the 22nd of December. The Brazilians left 400 dead in the batteries, and are supposed to have carried away an equal number. On the part of the combined forces, the greater loss fell on the French.

The account of this affair is contained in a letter dated Buenos Ayres, Nov. 30.—On the 28th Nov., the Procida, French hired vessel, arrived at Buenos Ayres, bringing word that, on the 20th November, the combined Anglo-French forces took up their position at ten A.M. The San Martin, bearing the flag of Captain Trehouart, leading, followed by the Comus, who, upon taking up her position, had her cables cut through, and went adrift. One hour and a half elapsed (from want of wind) before the Dolphin could pass the San Martin, which she did inside, between her and the left bank of the river. The action was kept up with great spirit on both sides until one P.M., when a shot from her Majesty's ship Dolphin blew up the Republican gun brig moored at a tête de pont above the boom. As the fire from the enemy's works did not slacken, Captain Hope manned his boat, and cut away the chain cables, and vessels comprising the boom, thus allowing the steamers to pass, and take the fort in reverse. This service was performed in a most gallant style, Captain Hope being exposed to a very severe fire of musketry.

At four P.M., the fire slackened, and carts were seen to be employed carrying away the dead and wounded from the batteries. The batteries were surrounded by a body of cavalry 3000 strong, armed as lancers. At half-past four, the gunner and soldiers in two of the enemy's batteries were seen to run from their guns, and endeavour to pass the line of cavalry; these latter charged upon them, and for a short time a severe skirmish was kept up between the two parties. The gunners were ultimately driven back to their posts, and another attempt was repulsed on their part with the like ill-success.

At six, P.M., the French Commander in Chief proposed to Captain Hotham to land and carry the batteries. Captain Trehouart passed up the line of the enemy's fire most gallantly, and rushing at the batteries first, carried it, and the enemy precipitately abandoned his position. It appears the guns had been worked on the enemy's batteries by Englishmen, Americans, and negroes. A son of Admiral Brown made himself very conspicuous on the ramparts of one of the batteries and escaped unhurt. The enemy's loss amounted to 120 negroes (gunners, &c.), found dead under their guns, and about 400 whites killed, and the like number wounded.

English loss—10 killed, and 25 wounded.

French loss—18 killed, and 70 wounded.

Large quantities of ordnance and stores were found in the works. Nineteen brass guns were reserved, the rest of the ordnance destroyed. The Fulton, French steamer, had her paddles knocked away, and her chimney cut through, besides one hundred and seven shot in her hull. The San Martin had 104 shots in her hull; the Dolphin riddled. Lieut. Bricklale, Satellite, killed; Mr. G. Andrews, clerk in charge, killed; Lieut. Doyle, of the Philomel, killed.

According to another account, the loss of the combined forces is French, 18 dead and 70 wounded. Among the dead, Michaud, officer of the San Martin. Among the wounded, the officers are—Hello, same ship; Vernels, of the Pandour; Simmonean, Expeditive; and Daudy, Fulton. The English have 10 killed and 25 wounded, and among the former are two officers, Lieutenant Brigdale, Firebrand; and Andrews, Dolphin. The Fulton has received 104 shot, the Dolphin 107. The San Martin has been literally riddled. Captain Trehouart had only one officer on board, and half the crew hors de combat, or 44 of 96.

The battle of Obligado is the more honourable to the two services in that it was not ships of the line and frigates, but merely brigs and even smaller vessels which advanced against batteries well served, well mounted, and well defended by entrenchments and works prepared for three months previously, and which were fought bravely for seven consecutive hours.

This victory will destroy the prestige which has hitherto favoured Rosas, and will open to the two intervening Powers a great work of civilisation.

ANOTHER ACCOUNT

The Brazil Courier of the 13th of December gives the following version of this gallant affair:—

On the part of the English there were the steamers Gorgon and Firebrand, Captain Hope; corvette Comus, Captain Inglefield; the brigs Philomel, Captain Sullivan; and the Dolphin, Captain Leving; the brigantine Fanny, Captain Key. Captain Hotham, commander-in-chief, on board the Gorgon.

On the part of the French there were the steamer Fulton, Captain Mazeres; the corvette Expeditive, Captain de Minlac; the brigs Pandour, Captain du Parc; San Martin, and the brigantine Procida, Captain de la Rivière. Captain Trehouart was the commander-in-chief on board the San Martin.

On the 18th of November, the combined forces moored about three miles from Point Obligado.

In the evening the Captains of the Fulton and Philomel went in a boat to reconnoitre the frontiers of the enemy's forces. They found four batteries established on the right bank of the river. The batteries mounted about 24 pieces of artillery, mostly of heavy calibre, besides several detached field-pieces. The river itself was barred by a stockade formed with 24 vessels, bound together by three strong iron chains. This stockade was placed between the third and fourth batteries. At one of the commanders on the left bank were 10 fire-ships ready to be let go; at the other extremity, at the left bank, was moored the Republicano (Rosas's brig), armed with many pieces of heavy calibre and designed to take in tow the opposing ships. Two of these batteries were nearly on a level with the river, and two others on peaks more or less elevated. Lastly, about 4,000 men infantry and cavalry, were posted so as to protect the shores, and oppose any landing. The works were very strong, and evidently under the direction of European Engineers, well acquainted with the rules of art; and the tenacity of resistance is to be attributed to the fact that the batteries were served by French deserters.

On the morning of the 20th, as soon as the mist cleared away, the combined forces formed in three divisions for the purpose of attack. The first, under the orders of Captain Sullivan, and composed of the Philomel, the Dolphin, and the schooners Fanny and Procida, received orders to take position towards the south, on the left bank, a little above the batteries, at about 700 metres distance, so as to take them en echarpe. This manœuvre successfully executed, fire was commenced immediately on both sides.

The second division, under the command of Captain Treloanart, composed of the San Martin, the Comus, the Pandour, and the Dolphin, took up a position towards the north, quite close to the stockade, and in front of the batteries, and at the same distance of 700 metres.

This division was not only to attack the batteries, but also the republicans, whose fire took it en flanc, as before stated. Unfortunately, whilst the St. Martin was anchoring, the wind happening to fall the vessels which followed were, the brig was for a long time exposed to the fire of the batteries, and this fire was directed against her with a greater fury because she was recognised as one of the Buenos Ayrean squadron captured before Monte Video. The generous efforts, however, of the Dolphin to draw close to the St. Martin and protect her from fire, seconded by the diversion of her artillery, and by drawing on herself a part of the enemy's fire. The San Martin had already her two only officers and several of her seamen severely wounded. The Comus and the Pandour had, by this time, come to 1200 positions as near as the bank permitted, as well as the Fulton and the Procida, both of which Captain Trehouart made signal to join. The battle was then continued with spirit on both sides. Although the enemy discharged but a shot pretty freely against all opponents, his especial fury was directed against the San Martin, throughout the engagement.

This brig soon had 44 men placed hors de combat, two pieces dismounted, her rigging destroyed, her masts ready to fall, the mainmast alone having received 11 balls. Notwithstanding all these disadvantages she continued to fight vigorously, when another shot struck her chain-cable, and at length forced her to quit her position. A bomb shell from the Dolphin at the same moment set fire to the Republicano, which shortly after blew up.

The fire-ships were then launched by the enemy, but being turned by the current, did not produce the intended effect.

The third division, under the command of Captain Hotham, composed of the Gorgon and Firebrand (the Fulton had joined the second division), had waited in observation at the distance of 1300 metres from the farthest battery, throwing thence Lollow projectiles in all directions.

Captain Hope of the Firebrand, went in his boat into the midst of the fire to break the chains which united the stockade.

His intrepidity was crowned with the most complete success. When once the chains were broken, the strong current opened the line of vessels forming the stockade, and the Fulton immediately took advantage to pass through and place herself in a position higher up, so as to cross her fire with that of the first division.

It was at this period that Captain Trehouart, quitting the San Martin, which was totally disabled for further service, went on board the Gorgon to concert with his colleague, Captain Hotham. Thence he passed to the Gorgon, and made the signal of union to the Pandour and Procida; he then ordered his three ships to run aground at pistol-shot distance from the batteries, upon which they threw a shower of grape. The combined forces came up quickly to sustain this intrepid manœuvre. At the same time, Captain Hotham disembarked, with much skill and vigour, 326 English soldiers. This determined conduct on the part of the two commanders, executed with equal bravery and success, overcame the last resistance of the enemy, and decided the day

The first English detachment, under the command of Captain Sullivan, had been received on landing by a heavy fire of musketry from the enemy in ambush in an adjoining wood; but the arrival of the rest of the troops, under the orders of Lieut. Hindle, quickly put the enemy to flight, notwithstanding the efforts of their cavalry, which were charging and ruthlessly slaughtering the English infantry.

Captain Trehouart having likewise landed with his men, shortly after joined the English, and took possession of the batteries, on which the enemy discontinued his fire resistance.

On the morning of the 21st additional forces landed, and completed the destruction of the batteries. The gun carriages were destroyed, and the guns broken or cast into the river. Ten bronzed cannons only were preserved, and shipped on board the combined squadron. All this day the allied forces remained ashore without being in the least disturbed.

It was during the hottest part of this remarkable engagement that Captain Hotham wrote to his colleague, Captain Trehouart, the words underneath quoted words equally honourable to the writer and to the party addressed:—"If the title of 'brave' has ever been deserved, it is by you and your crews." "Si le titre de 'brave' a jamais été merité, c'est par vous et vos equipages."

The engagement with the batteries began at 10 A.M., and lasted till 5 P.M., during which time there was an incessant firing. From 5 to 7 P.M., the landing and the destruction of the works took place.

We have received the following from a Correspondent on board the Cuckoo:—

"I believe the vessels were chiefly in their positions by half-past ten A.M. I could not learn whether Rosas's brother died from wounds or other causes. He commanded the post which is supposed to have been the strongest. Many Rosas, The Black Trade was very brisk at Rio during the engagement, and the Brazilian Government in the River Plate. We bring home a French Secretary of Legislature from Buenos Ayres, and the Master (Mr Corfey), and two of the crew of the English brig Cotherine, of Whitehaven, Cumberland, which sprung a leak between Montevideo and Rio Janeiro (in ballast); they were obliged to run her on shore to save their lives, near the river Chuey, adjoining the Oriental boundary. Orbe's party took possession of her, and plundered her and threw her crew of everything. Captain Coffey saved his chronometer, sextant, and watch, by having them in an old clothes'-bag. They were detained, as prisoners of war, four months; but at length were given up to our Admiral in the Plate. Capt. Coffey states that Mr. Fidley, the American Consul at Montevideo, was very kind to him and crew—relieving them in every manner he possibly could; and that one of his crew had been murdered, having struggled from his companions after nightfall: he had evidently been wounded with some sharp instrument about the face; and placed in a leaning position against a bank in a pool of water, stripped of all the clothes about him of any value—money he had none; and Capt. C. thinks, had the news of the above action reached before they were given up, that his whole crew would have shared the same fate—from the ill-feeling that appeared to exist from the natives against both English and French."

OPENING OF THE JAMAICA RAILWAY.

The completion of a line of Railway from Kingston to Spanish Town, in Jamaica, is a most gratifying instance of colonial enterprise; and proves that the energies of the people have not been repressed even by the sweeping calamities of fire and tempest, incident to their country. Somewhat more than two years since we had to record the burning of a great part of the Capital, Kingston; and, it is with very different feelings that we now call attention to this town as a terminus of the newly completed Railway

The opening took place on Friday, the 21st of November last. The event had been long and anxiously anticipated; and, in order to invest it with the just degree of importance, his Excellency the Governor, the Lieutenant Governor, the several heads of departments civil and military, the hon. Members of the Council and Assembly, and a large number of the more wealthy and influential members of the community, were invited to attend the ceremony; and a most propitious day rendered this attendance very general and numerous. An enormous crowd of spectators was collected all around the stations, and several very extensive booths were filled with well-dressed females. His Excellency the Earl of Elgin arrived at a little after eleven o'clock, attended by his brother, Lieutenant-Colonel the Hon. Robert Bruce, and accompanied by the Receiver General. He was received by a guard of honour from the 1st West India Regiment, the band of that regiment playing the national anthem. After a short conversation with Mr. William Smith, the Projector and Resident Director of the Company, and a recognition of the numerous gentlemen who were collected on the occasion, his Excellency was conducted at about half-past eleven o'clock to the handsome state carriage provided by the Company for the accommodation of her Majesty's representative, and the Company's new engine "The Projector" having been attached, the train, consisting of some eight or ten well filled carriages, started on the first railway excursion in the British West Indies; the excellent band of the 1st West India Regiment taking its stand in the last, third class, carriage, and playing lively airs.

The train passed at a slow pace through the suburban portions of the line, which were densely thronged on both sides with crowds of welcoming citizens, who gladly closed the novel exhibition as it passed before them. These crowds were more or less to be seen along the whole line of railway. At the embankment through the morass, beyond Hunt's Bay, generally known as "The Islands," the trains stopped, and his Excellency and party, and walked forward with Lieut.-Col. Bruce, Mr. Smith, and the Engineer, Mr. Miller, in order to examine this difficult work. At the new bridge over the Rio Cobre, the train made a second stoppage, in order to water the engine, and arrived at the Spanish Town terminus at about half-past twelve; the speed being kept very low the whole distance, for the double purpose of allowing the passengers a view of the works, and of preventing the possibility of accident amongst the crowd of spectators collected at both termini, as well as along the road.

At Spanish Town, the Governor descended, and proceeded to examine the stations in course of erection, and the other works and designs of the Company at that terminus. Meanwhile, the engine was adjusted to the other end of the train, and his Excellency and the other passengers having taken their seats, the train started on its return at one o'clock, reaching the Kingston Station in about 40 minutes. The speed on the return was, during a portion of the distance, considerably increased, a maximum speed of 30 miles an hour having been attained; but on nearing Kingston, the rapidity was very greatly diminished, with the same objects as those already stated. A second trip was shortly afterwards made, when a large number of other persons who had been favoured with tickets took their seats, and were similarly taken along the line and back, the return train on this occasion performing the distance (nearly 12 miles) in 25 minutes.

At a little after two o'clock, his Excellency the Governor and his distinguished party, and about 120 of the civil and military authorities, and influential gentlemen of the city, sat down to a superb déjeuner, provided at the expense of the Company, at the Victoria Rooms, in Duke-street. William Smith, Esq., the Resident Director, took the President's chair, being supported on his right by the Earl of Elgin, the Vice-Chancellor, Lieut.-Colonel Bruce, the 1st West India Regiment, and the Hon. Duncan Robertson; and on his left by Lieut.-Col. the Hon. Robert Bruce, the Attorney-General, the Hon. Thos. James Bernard, and the Hon. Alexandre Bravo: opposite to Mr. Smith, and at the same table, sat the Speaker of the Assembly, with Lieut.-Colonel Warren, Adjutant-General, on his right, and Captain Darling on his left. John Nethersole, Esq., and David Smith, Esq., the manager, acted as Vice-Presidents. Several well-timed speeches were made; and the company did not separate till a late hour.

We receive this as the spirit of Railway enterprise is rife in Jamaica: in the Despatch, whence we have abridged the preceding Report, we find advertised an Atmospheric line (Pilbrow's) from Milk River to Montego Bay (Westerly.)

 SUPPLEMENT, GRATIS!—We have printed with our Journal of this week, a Full Report of the interesting Proceedings in the House of Commons, on the occasion of Sir Robert Peel proposing the New Measures of the Government, on Tuesday night. We hope this will be acceptable to our Subscribers, and prove to them our determination, at any sacrifice of cost, to give full information on Questions of great public importance.

ERRATUM. From our description of the Patent Enamelled Pearl, Glass, and Paper-Mâché Works, in a former No. of our Journal, the reader may, probably, imagine that Mr. Lane is the proprietor of the Establishment in Kingstreet, Covent Garden; whereas, such is the property of Mr. Cheshire.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 31, 1846.

THE debate on the Address, usually an unimportant one, was, on the present occasion, of the greatest interest. This was not due solely to the explanations—both Ministerial and from the Opposition—of all the circumstances that produced and attended the "Crisis," nor did it reside wholly in the revelation of the acceptance by the Premier of the principle of Free Trade to its fullest extent—startling though that revelation has been. There is a deeper interest still awakened by the whole debate, which, from the turn it took, involved no less than the most difficult questions of the theory of party and representative Government, and what may be called the morality of statesmanship and politics.

There are two conflicting theories on this great question so directly opposed to each other, that it is impossible to reconcile them; either may be adopted, but both it is impossible to entertain together. One theory requires from a statesman the most rigid consistency, as it is called—that is to say, he must never change his opinions on any question, or, if he changes them, he must not carry them into effect. From the principles with which he started he must never deviate, even to adopt better: if those former principles have gained him the support of a party, he must, by that link, remain tied to that party for ever. No necessity—however great—can absolve him from this allegiance; the Minister so elevated must rather be the servant of a party than the ruler of a state. The other theory is less rigid in its requirements; it allows to statesmen, as to other men, a liberty of modifying their opinions, if time and greater experience throw new lights upon old and imperfectly understood questions. It leaves a Minister free to act according to the requirements of the age, though he may formerly have opposed the very policy he now supports; it allows him to defy the formidable tomes of Hansard, and all quoters and quotations therefrom. It does not say, because you once spoke on imperfect information, you must not now act upon fuller knowledge; it does not, in fact, bind the present in the iron fetters of the past, but leaves the powers of the man free to face the difficulties of the time with the measures best calculated to surmount them. The conflict between the two theories is, indeed, the old question of Principle against Expediency, revived now with more animosity than ever.

"Measures, not men," has often been taken as a favourite political motto: it is an open declaration against party theories—a breaking down of those distinctions which have often kindled so much animosity. It was once impossible even to hope that one set of men would ever originate measures that could be supported by the other set of men opposed to them, still less that a party would adopt and carry out the very principles enunciated by their political opponents. Then the only chance the people had of gaining certain measures, was to place in power those whose principles would allow of those measures proceeding from them. But, whether for good or ill, this strict division of parties appears impossible now to maintain; and we have long been in a manner accustomed in the field of politics to gather grapes from thorns and figs from thistles, and to find Whig fruit upon Tory branches. We have arrived fairly at a time when "measures, not men," is the guiding precept. The only power now acknowledged is the necessity of the time; what must be done is done, though a thousand declarations stand recorded against its wisdom and fitness. All we can hope is, that the conversion is sincere and the necessity a real one: if the first is simulated and the latter a delusion, then will our statesmen degenerate into mere tricksters for office, and Government become a series of concessions to a passing panic. But let the necessity be great and real, and the change of opinion sincere, and we must think the avowal of that change bold and honest, and the acting upon it the best political wisdom.

We can, however, fully appreciate the anger and vexation of those whose minds are not so open to conviction, and who consider themselves more closely bound by their declarations to their constituents, than their leader thinks himself tied to them. Having gained our seats by avowing one set of principles, are we free to act upon those most opposite to them, is a very natural question? It can only be met with another—is a legislator chosen to do what is best, or merely to cling to that which is oldest—is he justified in pledging himself to principles that may be found impossible to be maintained with safety to the State? Whatever may be thought upon this point, it is certain a ruler cannot always be so strictly bound; new dangers, and more formidable responsibilities may surround him, from which he cannot escape by continuing in the old course which rather imperatively force him to reverse it. Should he then continue to govern, or should he resign and quit the post?

Mr. Disraeli says yes; he is the champion of what he calls political morality, and insists that a statesman is bound to his party by the declarations on the faith of which he gained their support; and that, when he changes his opinions, he has no right to expect his party to change theirs also; and he tells Sir Robert Peel plainly enough that, "Even if such measures are necessary, you are not the man who should propose them; the country placed us here, and you in office, on principles exactly the reverse; and, whether they were good or bad, we have no right to change them. Sir, this is a breach of contract!" That there is force and justice in this, none can deny; the past career, and the former declarations, all the "antecedents," to use a favourite word, of Sir Robert Peel, are unfortunate for the dignity, if they will not affect the usefulness, of his present position. He has to avow that his former opinions were untenable; that he yields them to the force of experiment and experience; and he does this boldly and without reserve, denying that, in doing so, he feels any humiliation; and, above all, he pleads great and imperious State necessity. Could Mr. Disraeli and those he represents show how, if this power of providing for exigencies were denied to a Minister, any government would long be possible? It is easy to erect a high standard, by which to judge either men or governments; the "idea" may be carried up to perfection, but all human things can but remotely approach it. Not what is theoretically the best, but what is practically possible, is of the most importance for us to consider. Mr. Disraeli's "great statesman" might do something for the world, if he had superhuman talents, and a life of centuries to work in. He says:—

> My idea of a great statesman is one who represents a great idea. That may lead him to power. To connect himself with a great idea, to develop it, to impress it upon the mind and conscience of a nation, makes a man a great statesman. I do not care whether he is a manufacturer, or a manufacturer's son; he would, by such a course, attain a sublime and heroic position. But I care not what may be the nature of a man who never originates an idea—who watches the atmosphere (a laugh)—who takes his observation—and when he finds the wind in a certain quarter, trims in that way (laughter); I don't care how high his position may be, but the man who does not gain that position by developing and advocating an idea, and a great principle, may be a powerful Minister, but he is not a great statesman.

If this is the true definition of a "great statesman," the world never had one; it has been ruled by nothing but great Ministers. "Great ideas" are rare, even rarer than great men, and when enunciated are long in winning their way, for the "mind and conscience of a nation" are not reached so easily nor so soon. No author of a great idea ever lived to see it fully developed; that is the work of ages, not of a single life. Reckoning up all the great statesmen whose names are recorded, we know not one who was other than a strong-minded man, dealing in the most practical manner with the circumstances around him, often by means the most detestable. Richelieu raised the power of the French Crown by crushing the Aristocracy: his means were the headsman and the scaffold. Walpole, in another age, disarmed his enemies by plain, vulgar bribery. In all times Rulers have been as far removed from perfection as the ruled. Not one has ever originated a great idea, and worked it out in his government. The utmost they have done was to guide and direct tendencies they found existing, but did not make.

Cromwell fell upon an age which had long begun to question the principle of "right divine," and found wild theories of Government and religion fermenting in society, long before the outbreak of the storm that levelled the Monarchy with the dust. Napoleon appeared when anarchy had done its worst, and he imposed on the disorder of the social chaos the only organisation the enthusiasm of the age and people would bear—a military one. The French Revolution was not his idea; but history presents many examples of States with a military Government. "Great ideas" are no sudden flashes of national inspiration: not so does the world progress; great changes there are, but the principle that produces them is often a very old one. Reform and the Abolition of Slavery were questions debated for more than half a century; they were great measures, but not great ideas, since they were but the natural practical remedies of existing evils. The principles of the science of political economy, which are now becoming the basis of legislation, have been known to the world for ages; more than a hundred and twenty years have elapsed since Adam Smith was born—yet how strongly opposed are many of his doctrines by large numbers of educated men, even at the present day! No; we must give up the hope of being governed by statesmen of "great ideas;" we must trust to "Ministers" (to adopt Mr. Disraeli's distinction) who can practically meet the necessities of their age, since we find that ideas exist in a country, that present problems to be solved for which no former theories of Government can afford us a guide. Measures, and how they work, must be the consideration now, rather than "Men, and what they think," for it is an age that prefers action to speculation.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

> The seasons alter; hoary-headed frosts
> Fall in the fresh lap of the crimson rose,
> And on old Hyem's chin and icy crown
> An odorous chaplet of sweet summer buds
> Is as in mockery set: the spring, the summer,
> The chilling autumn, angry winter, change
> Their wonted liveries. SHAKSPEARE.

A season, open beyond all precedent, gives promise of a stirrup-cup such as has not often been quaffed by modern Nimrods. During the current week we had opportunities of seeing the state of more than one of the metropolitan hunting establishments, which resembled little scenes rather than places appropriated to woodcraft. Before Christmas, in many of the crack counties, "enough" was the order of the day; and, unless we have a speedy frost or less ruthless riding among the ambitious of first flight places, hunting establishments will have full larders. The staunch hunter, as well as the unsound valetudinarian, should bear in mind the old saw—"A green Christmas makes a full churchyard." . . . . A master of hounds once asked his huntsman "what could be the reason the scent was so bad?" to which the servant replied, "he couldn't tell—unless it was along of the making of the violets." It will probably be told of the season of 1846, that a master asking a huntsman "why he didn't catch his fox?" was answered, "because he hadn't a steamboat for the view hollos!" The chase—except after pups upon the Sussex downs, or "in Cumberland among the hills"—is for the present restricted to the amphibious; or persons "with a decided turn for the sea."

Coursing is in a similar category—and as for steeple-chasing, unless performed on snow shoes, no horse but Pegasus could keep his nose above the surface of the earth. Consternation prevails at Gunter's and among the manufacturers of skates: they look in each other's faces—blue with anxiety instead of frost, and tremulously ask, "Is there to be no ice?" They haunt the glympses of Covent Garden, and see the funeral wreck of their hopes—odorous chaplets of sweet summer buds. So gloomy is the instant condition of out-door sports—we say nothing of balls and soirées, but this, that, if people must dance with the temperature where it is, for the sake of personal grace and comfort it's a pity the polka has superseded the minuet.

Turn we to the theory of sporting, since its practice is forbidden by so many considerations. The turf is the only resource of the gentleman of enterprise and spirit—and even that has "had its crosses." The other other day Tattersall's was too hot to hold the subscribers, and they were constrained to adjourn to the Circle. Perhaps they may find that pop warm for them between this and the setting for the St. Leger.

The spring handicaps are out for the Newmarket in the Craven Meeting; 66 have declared forfeit of the 134 named. Where are those who have left their nominations in, to find jockeys at weights averaging under 7st.? The Chester Cup is the great fact of the market: it has always, heretofore, been fertile in excitement—we write for yesterday—and, no doubt, will be properly flavoured on its next anniversary. Who are the principal manufacturers of handicaps? It is essential they should be made known, that they may be avoided in future; as Brummell said to the "great," when he asked him the name and address of his tailor. Those who love racing for the sport, have had their hearts made glad by the prospect of a spirited day's operations in the Epsom Spring Meeting, as it is called—which occurs this year on Friday, the 3rd of April. The Licensed Victuallers have come forward and catered for the public, as becomes the patent purveyors of the multitude. We are announced, some weeks ago, the good work they had undertaken: happy are we to say, their success has equalled their desert.

The Great Metropolitan Stakes will be a dish to set before a King; worthy the artists employed upon them. Sir Robert Heathcote and the inhabitants between them supply the Plates: so it will be seen all the necessary materials for a feast are provided. Who shall gainsay the proverb wherein it is written, "when things come to the worst they mend?" Here is a society of good Samaritans furnishing fun for nothing, and a Prime Minister offering food for the million nearly gratis: cost, while the ears of the hungry are yet tingling with the bill of fare proposed for their consideration by one of the heirs of the country's wisdom.

Shakspeare complains that man "receives comfort like cold porridge:" hence, probably, the Duke of Norfolk concluded he would be ready to jump at it in the shape of a hot curry. Why should not philosophy like charity, be doubly blessed? And wherefore should it not be lawful for us to say to those who go through a process of semi-drowning twice a week (to say nothing of by-days) with the Royal stag-hounds—"Take comfort, gentlemen, there will be dust enough to smother you at Ascot Races?"... ...

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—The Chester Cup was the source of some heavy speculation, and three or four animals, supposed to be "wels in" and therefore greatly fancied, became "rating" favourites; these were Best Bower, Whalstone, Miss Burns, and Sweetmeat. The outlay was heavy, and the commissions apparently unlimited. Micky Free and that impostor, Cataract, were also in some favour with select parties. The Newmarket Handicap was scarcely mentioned, and the Derby movements were too few and inconsequential to call for a remark.

THURSDAY.—Another busy day—that is for a Thursday. The great guns for the Chester Cup were Sweetmeat and Mickey Free, both lions at Manchester in the early part of the week, and therefore in great force with the metropolitans. To what extent their positions were improved may be seen below. A good deal of money was laid out on other nags, but without leading to any material changes. Very little was done on the Derby; and the Oaks betting was remarkable only for the extreme anxiety to back Fantastic. We submit the closing prices:—

TROTTING MATCH.—A trotting match took place last Tuesday, on Sunbury Common, for £50 a-side, between Mr. Jenkins' bay horse and Mr. Power's chesnut horse, five miles, which was gallantly contested, they going neck and neck the first two miles, when the bay broke, and the chesnut went a-head; but it was a short-lived advantage, the bay flying past him in the next mile. They then trotted home in capital style, the chesnut striving to pass him again, but could not get his head further than the stock of his opponent's wheel. Owners driving; time 17 minutes 16 seconds. Afterwards the party dined at Mr. H. Powell's, the Bell, Hampton, and enjoyed themselves till rather a late hour

THE ROYAL STAG HOUNDS.—About one hundred were at the Meet on Wednesday, at Farnham Common—many more than could have been expected, from the unfavourable state of the weather, and the heavy nature of the country. The "Richmond" Stag, upon being uncarted near Alderman's Bottom, took away in the direction of Beaconsfield, through Mr. Hare's farm to the Three Houses Inns, on to Chalfont St. Giles's, leaving the village to the left, and thence through the Vatch, crossing Charley Wood Common, to Rickmansworth; and was there taken, after a very fast run of an hour and three quarters, over a fair hunting country. The Stag, keeping on the high lands, avoided the water, which covered the valleys and low grounds in every direction.

POSTSCRIPT.

SIR R. PEEL'S PLAN, AND ITS RESULTS

On Thursday, the Central Agricultural Society, under the presidency of his Grace the Duke of Richmond, held a special meeting for the purpose of considering the Ministerial scheme, and the following resolutions and recommendations were unanimously agreed to:—"That the Society views with the utmost alarm the proposed measures of Sir Robert Peel for establishing free importation, and withdrawal of protection from the productive classes. That this Society feels convinced that the results of such measures would produce a revolution of such fearful extent as to involve not only the agricultural but the other productive classes of this country in certain ruin. It is recommended to the country and local Protection Societies, that they do immediately form committees, of not more than twelve gentlemen, to wait upon the members of their districts, who were elected on Protective principles, and press them either to reject the proposal of Sir Robert Peel, or at once to resign their seats, and appeal to their different constituencies for a sanction of the change in their political opinions."

A meeting of the council of the Anti-Corn-law League took place at Manchester, on Thursday morning, to consider the steps it is necessary to take upon the intended measures of the Premier in reference to the Corn-laws. George Wilson, Esq., presided. It is understood that an animated discussion took place, in which there was an unanimous feeling displayed that the measures of the Premier would not meet the exigencies of the present emergency, and that it was a temporising policy, unworthy of a statesman confessedly converted to the impolicy of any longer maintaining prohibitive or protective laws. A resolution was come to, which was to the effect that the announcement of a new Corn-law rendered it desirable that the friends of Free-Trade throughout the kingdom should be invited to originate petitions for the total and immediate abolition of the Corn and Provision Laws.

A letter from Oakham, dated Jan. 29, says: "The proceedings in the House of Commons on Monday evening, have already led to a vacancy in one of the seats for Rutlandshire. The Hon. Mr. Dawnay, who was returned at the last election, to support protection in opposition to Viscount Campden (also a Protectionist, but a Liberal), has, in deference to the feelings of the agriculturist constituency, determined on accepting the Chiltern Hundreds. It is believed that Lord Exeter has entirely disconnected himself from the Peel Cabinet.

At a meeting of the Nottinghamshire Agricultural Protection Society, held on Thursday, a letter was read from Lord Lincoln, announcing his Lordship's change of opinion on the Corn-laws, when Mr. Stenton proposed the following resolution, viz.: "That this meeting, having heard from the Earl of Lincoln that he is prepared to support the measures of Sir R. Peel, instructs the committee immediately to forward to his Lordship a copy of certain resolutions, and to request him to take the only step consistent with public honour, by resigning his seat as member for South Nottinghamshire." Mr. Chowler seconded the motion, which was agreed to with loud applause

Lord John Manners has addressed a letter to the electors of Newark, in which he says:—"So far as I know, there is no reason why Sir Robert Peel should be the Minister to propose in this Parliament a repeal of the Corn-laws, nor the House of Commons of 1841, the House of Commons in which it should be proposed; and, entirely apart from the merits or demerits of Free-Trade, I regard the proposal of such a measure by Sir Robert Peel to this present House of Commons with feelings of the deepest regret and alarm—regret that, at a time when the Executive Government requires all the support it can honestly receive, its measures should be so proposed as to alienate, rather than conciliate, such support; and alarm, at the prospect before us.

PRIVY COUNCIL.—Her Majesty held a Privy Council at Buckingham Palace yesterday, at half-past two o'clock, which was attended by most of the Ministers and great officers of state.

ANOTHER ACCIDENT ON THE EASTERN COUNTIES RAILWAY.—An accident took place on Wednesday at Milton-bridge, about two miles from Canterbury, on that portion of the South Eastern (Canterbury Branch) Railway which forms the approach from Ashford, and which occasioned the loss of a life. The late heavy rains sapped the new brickwork, and caused about forty feet of the approach to the bridge to give way: one of the workmen employed was buried in the ruins, and two others were slightly hurt. Lamentable as the accident in itself was, the loss might have been more deplorable, as a good many men were engaged near the spot. A coroner's inquest was held at Canterbury, and the jury brought in a verdict of "Accidental death." Deodand is on the materials.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

ALGERIA.—The Paris journals of Wednesday contain further accounts from Algeria, by which it appears that Marshal Bugeaud had been compelled, from want of provisions, and the exhausted state of his troops, to make a retrograde movement. All idea of further operations of importance against Abd-el-Kader seems, therefore, to have been abandoned for the remainder of the winter.

COLLISION ON THE EASTERN COUNTIES RAILWAY.—On Sunday a serious collision occurred on this line of railway, though happily unattended with disaster to life or limb. Shortly after one o'clock the luggage train for London was proceeding, in order to let the wheels cool, as the axle-boxes had become overheated from the friction. Before the train could proceed a passenger train arrived, and, as it is said, through some mistake of the signal-men, in showing a wrong light, ran into the luggage train, completely smashing a truck laden with flour, and breaking in another in which were cattle intended for the London market, and also inflicting considerable injury on the engines belonging to both trains. The damage to the property of the Company is considerable, the trucks having been much bent, and several of the sleepers destroyed.—An investigation took place at Newport, on Thursday, before the county magistrates, it being stated in evidence that Sandstead rose from the neglect of Mr. Alfred King, the late station-master there. The result was that the defendant was committed for trial at the Quarter Sessions.

GRAND MARRIAGE FESTIVITIES AT CAIRO.

Cairo has lately been the scene of the magnificent marriage festivities of Mehemet Ali's daughter with Kiamil Pasha. The event is said to have cost Mehemet Ali half-a-million sterling; and, in giving the orders for the expenditure, he is said to have exclaimed, in the true Caliph style, "This is the last folly I will ever commit."

But who is the fortunate bridegroom of the Viceroy's daughter? The Times correspondent tells us that "Kiamil Pasha is approaching 40 years of age, of the humblest origin, and a native of Arabkir, in Armenia. He went to Egypt in his youth, and has gradually risen in rank and the favour of the Pasha to his present eminent position, in spite of a great deal of opposition and intrigue, by the simple honesty and sincerity of his character. His office is that of Weleed, or personal commissioner of the Pasha; and although he has never been in Europe or received any Frank education, the sound practical sense he displays on every occasion has rendered for him a solid reputation. When we say that to this he adds the most popular and affable manners, it may safely be predicted that he will henceforth play a principal part in the affairs of Egypt."

Some weeks since we read of the costly presents sent to the bridegroom. Thus, the Sultan forwarded by his Ambassador, a snuff-box and a Turkish pipe, both richly studded with precious stones and to the bride a magnificent turban diadem. The Sultan's mother sent two splendid pipes, a rosary, and a bouquet of precious stones to the young couple. At the same time, the Sultan sent to the Viceroy a handsome sword set in diamonds

To borrow an European phrase of some antiquity, "in the memory of the oldest inhabitant," no such magnificence has been seen at Cairo, which was then, indeed "Grand."

The first day of the festivities (which in all lasted six days) there was a grand banquet at the citadel of 900 covers, at four tables, at which the Viceroy, the Pashas, the Consul-Generals, and high dignitaries were present.

The ladies were admitted to a magnificent supper given by the eldest daughter of the Pasha, widow of the late Defterdar (Lord Treasurer), where, including the slaves, not less than 3500 women, from all nations, &c., were present, and it is said 300 cooks were employed to prepare this stupendous feast. The female slaves performed music during the repast, and afterwards pipes, sherbets, ices, &c., were handed round, during which all sorts of dances were performed—Greek, Arabic, Bedouin, &c.—and the last were an European quadrille and waltz.

Some of the European ladies remained three days and three nights in the harem, where they were provided with everything they could desire.

The whole town was illuminated, fireworks were exhibited on the public squares, mountebanks, circuses, and theatres were erected for the public, and a horse race took place the second day.

The Pasha had at the Citadel a theatre erected for the occasion, which he himself attended with his whole Court, and a separate box was kept for the Consul-Generals. Italian operas, French vaudevilles, and Italian dramas, were performed.

An English lady present asserts that she never expected or thought that so many diamonds and precious stones existed in any one country. There were 15 English ladies present.

The description of the nocturnal celebrations, by the Times' Correspondent, is very graphic:—

"At each sunset, all Cairo was in a blaze of illumination. The Eybekieh became like six Vauxhalls; every tree had its many coloured lamps, and an avenue of transparent arches and columns, reaching right across its thick verdant plantations, seemed from the roofs of the bordering houses to have enchanted into a carpet of green and gold. But far transcending the theatrical brilliancy of the Eybekieh was the aspect of the fantastic minarets of the mosques of the best period of Saracenic architecture, shooting up into the dark sky by the light of thousand of rockets and millions of lamps. There was the glare of cressets for that stern and gloomy old Bab-Zuetleh, the Temple-Bar of Cairo's Strand and Fleet-street, with the masses of the olden time hanging to remind the modern Cairean that the race of iron-hand-and-hearted Moslems is extinct; the Mehemet Alis and the Ibrahim Pashas being the exceptions that form the rule. Further along the great artery my eyes caught the alternate lines of white and red of the elegant monuments of two Kalaons, which recal a period so fertile with events, that we shall not pardon M. Quatremere if he delays the continuation of his fascinating Memoirs of those times. The citadel was one blaze of light, which shone with full force on the majestic proportions of the mosque of Sultan Hassan. Here giant simplicity towering stage on stage emaces from the mind all other objects, save and except the temple of Moyad. Had Arab architecture united the modern Cairean that the race of iron-hand-and-hearted Moslems is extinct; the Mehemet Alis and the Ibrahim Pashas being the exceptions that form the rule. GRAND MARRIAGE FESTIVITIES AT CAIRO.—THE PASHA'S SONS.

The Marriage Processions were very splendid; and our artist has represented two of these joyous pageants. The bride, it should be explained, lived in the Palace of the "Citadel." The new residence for the bride and bridegroom is a reconstruction of the Beit Sitty Bey, on the Fyls kieh, which was the residence of Napoleon during the French invasion, and which then formed two corps de logis, marked "Quartier-General" and "Maison du Gen ral-en-Ch f" in the French plan of Cairo, the present palace having been occupied by Mehemet Bey, the Defterdar of Egypt, and son-in-law of Mehemet Ali, who died many years ago. It has been newly furnished in the most sumptuous manner with Lyons satin damask hangings, the principal selamlic having two pier glasses, each, 15 feet high, being the largest ever seen in the East.

"It was through the line of bazaars lying between the two Palaces that the marriage presents passed, the diamonds lying in their caskets, or mounted on the marriage presents, literally blazing in the resplendent sunshine of a Cairo noon. The procession of the eighth day, conducting the bride from the citadel to the palace assigned to Kiamel Pasha, presented the oddest contrast imaginable. Immediately after the crack regiment of Cuirassiers, composed of picked men, superbly mounted and accoutred, with their drawn sabres and casques of burnished steel, came an army of eunuchs, to escort the carriages of the bride and her companions, all the blinds being, as a matter of course, drawn closely down."

In the foreground of our first Illustration are the Pasha's sons, and the "crack Cuirassiers." The second scene is the bridal equipage on the Eighth Day. It was, altogether, such a spectacle as is rarely witnessed.

AGRICULTURAL PICTURES.—THE STRAW-YARD, BERKSHIRE.

AGRICULTURAL PICTURES.—JANUARY.

THE STRAW-YARD.

We here present to our Readers the commencement of a Series of Illustrations of the Agricultural occupations of "the rolling year." The specimen before us is from the highly artistical pencil of Mr. Duncan, and is a scene of actual life—not a painter's composition. The locality is in the neighbourhood of Reading, in Berkshire.

Touching the business of the scene, we may quote the following appropriate passage from Mr. Henry Stephens's valuable "Book of the Farm;"—

"Almost the entire live-stock of an arable farm is dependent on the hand of man for food in winter. It is this circumstance which, bringing the stock into the immediate presence of their owner, creates a stronger interest in their welfare than at any other season. The farmer then sees them classed together in the farmstead according to their age and sex, and delights to contemplate the comparative progress of individuals or classes amongst them towards maturity."

There is a charm, too, in the wintry landscape, which rarely fails to strike the wayside observer. One of the most descriptive of Cobbett's "Rural Rides" is almost entirely devoted to what may be termed a rhapsody on the beautiful forms of trees in winter, and the graceful varieties of the bare-bough season. The natural phenomena of the time, too, are interesting. Thomson sings:

> All Nature feels the renovating force
> Of WINTER, only to the thoughtless eye
> In ruin seen. The frost-concocted globe
> Draws in abundant vegetable soul,
> And gathers vigour for the coming year.

Bloomfield, too, thus chronicles the seasonable pursuits:—

> When now, unsparing as the scourge of war,
> Blast follows blast, and groves dismantled roar,
> Around their home the storm-pinch'd cattle lows,
> No nourishment in frozen pasture grows;
> Yet frozen pastures every morn resound
> With fair abundance thund'ring to the ground.
> For though on hoary twigs no buds peep out,
> And e'en the hardy brambles cease to sprout,
> Beneath dread Winter's level sheets of snow
> The sweet nutritious Turnip deigns to grow,
> Till now imperious want, and wide-spread dearth,
> Bid Labour claim her treasures from the earth.
> On Giles, and such as Giles, the labour falls,
> To strew the frequent load where hunger calls."

"THE TERRIBLE," WAR-STEAMER

This noble steam-ship is in commission, and now fitting for sea at Woolwich, she has 20 guns mounted, also a brass field piece and carriage, and a waggon for powder to accompany it. On her upper deck, each side the bow, are two long 56-pounders, (Monk's 11-feet guns,) to fire fore and aft in a line with the keel; these are mounted on a slide, and will cross fire with each other, and also sweep round to the stern; two more of the same guns, right aft in the stern, will also cross and sweep to the broadside on their pivot, so as to fire forward, acting as chase guns if required. She has two 68-pounders on each broadside, to carry shells or solid shot, which can be trained fore or abaft, according to circumstances. On the deck below, which is also flush fore and aft, are eight guns, viz. two long 56-pounders, (Monk's guns, 11 feet long,) in the bow ports, to fire in a line with the keel; also several degrees of training on the broadsides, and two of the same guns in the stern, right aft, which can give such depression as to prevent even a small boat from coming under her stern; with four guns, 68-pounders, on her broadsides, for shells or solid shot. There are four smaller guns on the upper deck, to be traversed to any place, or carried on shore in her paddle-box boats, if required for use in landing troops, &c.

She has four separate boilers, independent of each other, which may be connected when required; four funnels, one to each boiler; the two after ones strike down, so as to allow a square mainsail to be set when sailing, and still using the two foremost boilers, thus working half her power at the same time, saving a considerable consumption of coals. This is an excellent contrivance, as there are four small funnels, instead of one large one, which is a great advantage, as the ship will not be wholly disabled by losing one, two, or even three funnels, like the one-funnel ship would be on hers being carried away; her one funnel lost, she has lost all.

The Terrible has two magazines, and two shell-rooms, one of each before the engine-room, and one abaft for the safety of the vessel, to prevent any powder passing the engine-room when firing the guns. She can store 400 tons of coals below the lower deck, and provided in addition on the midship part of the deck to take 300 or 300 tons more, packed in bags, as a defence from shot to the engines and boilers, filling up a space of 18 feet. In addition to her thick, substantial, solid sides, she has good capacity, and if required for any particular service can carry more coal in sacks.

With regard to the conveyance of troops, she can berth 1000 men under cover, on her second gun-deck, independent of her ship's company, their berth being below, forward, and the officers' cabins, gun-room, &c., abaft; so that each gun-deck is entirely clear, and always ready for action, without removing a bulkhead, and the deck being perfectly free from the main cabin shaft, to the bow of the vessel. She is constructed in the strongest and most substantial manner, on Mr. Lang's improved method of uniting the frame timbers, making her perfectly water-tight, so that she would swim, even if her external keel and plank were off her bottom. This method is also adopted in the Royal Albert, 120 guns, now in her frame, and may be seen on the slip in Woolwich dockyard.

The engine-room of the Terrible is most splendid; on deck, the whole length of the engine-room, are gratings, open and well ventilated by hatchways, giving light and air to the engineers, stokers, &c. It is an admirable plan, such as no steamer as yet has the advantage of; and each boiler has a separate hatchway, and may be readily taken out for repair, without interfering with the other boilers. This method, of Mr. Lang's invention, prevents the necessity of ripping up the deck, which is the case with other steamers when the boilers are required to be taken out from those vessels, and there, too, the deck covering the boilers, the engineers and stokers have the light admitted by the hatchway over the engines only.

The Terrible's engines are 800 horse-power, by Maudslay, Sons, and Field, and show to advantage in this large war-steamer. Her decks have hatchways in various parts, scuttles, skylights, &c., for ventilating the ship even to the lower parts of her hull; and there are many other conveniences too numerous to mention, contributing to the efficiency of the ship and the comforts of the officers and crew, so that she may be said to be the largest and most perfect war-steamer ever built. The Terrible is commanded by Captain Ramsay, late of the Dee steam-vessel, and she is to have a complement of 240 officers, men and boys.—Nautical Standard.

The paddle-wheels of this stupendous steamer are 34 feet in diameter; and when experimentally turned in the basin, a few days since, they so agitated the water, as to put all the vessels in motion around her, causing them to jump and toss about like little cock-boats, tearing the timbers by which they were fastened to the shore from their sides, and otherwise damaging the vessels moored alongside the quay; and, when the Terrible broke from her lashings, she went ahead and brought down some of the stone-work of the basin.

A GOSSIP ABOUT THE CORN-LAWS.

The riddle' of the week is read. Sir Robert has, for once in his life, been bold and open. He has thrown over the principle of Protection, made Cobden an oracle, and flung the country gentlemen, cruelly and remorselessly, into the Slough of Despond. Still there is tenderness in the way he handles these venerable relics of a by-gone system. They are to linger in life for three years, then to depart, unblessed and we hope, even by Dukes and farmers, unregretted. This Sir Robert means for kindness, but it is a cruel mercy; it is only prolonging the anticipatory agonies of those who believe with Corn-laws must fall Church, State, Constitution, Funds, Law, and everything that is worth preserving in England. It is like granting a reprieve of three days to an unhappy convict when he has made up his mind to take the dance upon nothing-to-morrow morning, that he may learn to like his destiny by thinking of it. The Duke of Richmond will be haunted by the phantom of this ghost of Protection, stalking about with its three years lease of upper air, and dinning into his ear the horrid tale of Peel's treachery and unnatural murder of this most ill-treated of enactments. We could write a political "Hamlet," the characters to run somewhat thus:—

Claudius, King of Denmark	...	Sir Robert Peel.
Hamlet	...	The Duke of Richmond.
Ophelia	...	Sir John Tyrell.
Horatio	...	The Duke of Buckingham.
Polonius	...	The Duke of Newcastle.
Ghost	...	The Sliding Scale.

The scene on the platform in which Hamlet holds discourse with the Ghost, might run, with the necessary alterations, in this fashion.—

SCENE—The Agricultural Society's Rooms, 17, Bond-street.

Re-enter GHOST OF SLIDING SCALE and the DUKE OF RICHMOND.

Duke. Whither will Peel lead us? Speak—I'll go no further.
Ghost of Sliding-Scale. Mark me!
Duke. I will!
Ghost. My hour is almost come,
When I to Cobden and tormenting Bright
Must render up myself!
Duke. Alas, poor Ghost!
Ghost. Pity me not; but lend thy serious hearing
To what I shall unfold.
Duke. Speak—I am bound to hear.
Ghost. So art thou to revenge when thou shalt hear.
Duke. Speak!
Ghost. I am Protection's Ghost,
Doom'd for three years to live as Sliding Scale,
And to come down from ten shillings per quarter,
Till, when thy price is up to fifty-three,
To four I fade away. Not that I am forbid
To tell the secrets of the Commons' House,
I could a tale unfold, whose startling facts
Would make the country blush; shock all the 'squires;
Fright e'en the Dukes—those stars among the Peers;
Make savage and combined chins to part,
And each particular member stand aghast—
Like France before our fierce Militia-men!
But such a tale of scandal must not be Printed in black and white. List! list! oh, list!
If thou didst ever thy dear Corn-law love,
Resist Free-Trade—that most infernal humbug!
Duke. Humbug!
Ghost. Humbug most foul, as humbug always is;
But this, of all humbugs, the most intol'rable.
Duke. Teach me to show it—that I, with phrase as glib
As Mr. Cobden's, or the tongue of Bright,
May talk in market towns.
Ghost. I find thee apt;
And duller should'st thou be than the fat pig
That wins the prize with ease in Baker-street.
Would'st thou not stir in this? Now, Richmond, hear,
'Tis given out that, talking through the country,
The Leaguers killed me—saying that the Duke
Shall be, by forgèd votes of Corn League freeholders,
Swamped out and out. But know, thou noble man,
The Villain that did floor the Sliding-scale,
Now guides the Crown!
Duke. Oh! my prophetic soul! Sir Robert!
Ghost. Ay, that low-man—the Cotton-spinner's son!
With offerings of place, fat sinecures
(But sinecures and places have the power
So to seduce), won to his Free-trade schemes
The very pet and most seeming arch of friends.
Oh, Richmond! what a falling-off was there!
From me—who have kept prices at that height,
That they maintained your rents, even at the pitch
They reached to with war prices—they to condescend
Unto Free-Trade, whose good to them is poor,
Compared with mine!
But, soft! methinks I hear St. James's clock—
Brief let me be: whilst I kept up your prices,
My custom always, in bad years, or good,
Upon our cause, a march the Premier stole,
With talk of blighted 'tater-crops and famine,
And, thro' the columns of the press, did pour
Commissioners' reports—whose vile effect
Made such a row among all sorts of men
That, in a bed-post's twinkling, it ran through
The provinces and manufacturing body,
And gave a sudden vigour to the League,
Which always showed the greatest want of taste
For thin and wholesome food—such food as mine.
And those incessant talkers barked about
The curry-powder, Norfolk's new found food
For peasants' bodies!
So was I, half upset by Leaguers' hands,
And then, by Peel's new scheme outright despatched;
Cut off, even at a time when corn was cheap,
Uncompensated, un-prepared, un-loved,
No care for you and your unpaid accounts,
The country's suffering laid upon my head!
Oh! rascally—oh! rascally—most rascally!
If you have pluck and money, beat it not;
Let not the noble land of England be
A place of cotton-mills and devil's-dust.
But howsoe'er thou pitchest into Peel,
Respect the Iron Duke! Leave him his proxies.
As for the taunts of you, his brother Peers,
They cannot sting him. Fare thee well, at once!
If you put up with this, you scon will be
Out of the frying-pan into the fire.
Adieu! adieu! adieu! Remember me.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"T. A. D."—We have answered the same questions fifty times. You should refer to the Laws of Chess.
"W. R."—Hayes.—Study the Elementary Lessons in the "Chess Player's Chronicle." You can have two or more Queens on the board at once.
"Z.," Southampton.—If, in Problem 103, the Black King is moved to Q 3rd, White obviously mates with his Q at K 3rd.
"H. W. M."—In the position sent, the Black King cannot take the Rook.
"Πεσσοναύτης," Cambridge.—Decidedly drawn, it appears to us.
"M. E. B."—It should have been "Pawn takes Pawn en passant, or in passing." The Duke of Wellington is a Chess Player.
"Christopher M.," Edinburgh.—The position is certainly curious. You would check with the Kt, and then play it to K 3rd to imprison the Queen, after which all is easy enough.
"A Slow Coach."—We cannot at the moment give an opinion upon your new notation. It appears very simple; and, for the purpose of transcribing games while they were being played, would doubtless be useful.
"S. S.," and "E. H. C.," Hull.—The work you name is immeasurably inferior, as a text-book, to either "Heydebrant's Hand-buch," or "Jaenisch's Treatise on the Openings."
"Silvio Pellico."—Unquestionably drawn.
"C. B. W."—We have not space to give the Solution in 17 moves, which you require; but you will find it at the end of Vol. I. of the "Chess Player's Chronicle," in which the Problem first appeared.
"W. F. T."—In our next we shall probably give the result of the match between Messrs. Stanley and Rousseau. Our last intelligence gave an account of the play to Saturday, Dec. 20*th, when, in all,* 23 games had been got through. Mr. Stanley winning ten, Mr. Rousseau seven, and six having been drawn.
"Z. Q. W."—We have no knowledge of the new game—Chess for four persons.
"G. S. C. M." Bay Tomlinson's "Amusements in Chess."
"W. H. A." The notation adopted in the translations of M. Heydebrant's great work is that used in the Chess articles of this Journal. You may readily solve the problem alluded to by first moving Kt to K 4*th (ch); then, King to his* 2*nd; and, finally, B to Q* 5*th.*
"True Chess."—Strictly speaking, you are right; but some latitude has been claimed by problem makers from time immemorial.
"Berlin."—You must give us evidence to the reports of the French papers on the subject of the great Chess Match between England and France. So far from M. St. Amant having been victorious, he was beaten without a chance.
"Cheraphim."—There is no answer on the question of the moves in Problem 104. Look again, and you will find that if the King take the Queen, mate can be effected in fewer moves.
"Zelo."—We cannot consent to reprint the handfuls games you mention. They were probably obtained at some cost and trouble, and are, therefore, the rightful property of the newspaper in which they appeared.

Solutions by "Wm. W."—"J. M.," Leeds; "An Amateur," "R. T.," "The Captain," "G. W.," "R. M.," Norwich"; "H. C. M." "E. W. R." Shropshire; "A. L.," Holtham; "E. C.," "Twig," and "A Member of the Jersey Club," are correct. Those by "M. E. B.," "Sir G. S." (who will find his former solution acknowledged as correct in our last), "Dr. W.," "Cantab," "F. R. S.," and "A Slow Coach," are wrong.

White to play first and mate in three moves.

Black abandons the Game.

* We should have ventured on taking the K R P at once.

† This Pawn might have been more advantageously taken three or four moves earlier, it appears to us.

‡ K R P one, with a view to regain the lost piece, would have been better play.

§ It was a great error, we think, to give White's B an inlet. Why not have taken Kt with Kt, and thus have won a piece in return for that sacrificed?

GAME THE EIGHTH.

WHITE (Rousseau).	BLACK (Stanley)	WHITE (Rousseau).	BLACK (Stanley)

18. Q to B 4th	Q to her 2nd	37. P takes R
19. R R to K 3rd	Q R to K sq	Black resigns.

* Badly calculated. After such a lapsus Black ought to have won the game.

† Black has now an excellent game. A pawn more, and a better position than his opponent, should have been enough to secure the victory.

‡ His best move. Had he played the R to K sq, Black would have advanced the K B Pawn.

§ This is an egregious fault. He had evidently expected to gain a piece if White took the Q Pawn, but overlooked the consequent check of the Bishop at Kt 8th.

After this, Black's game is hopeless. White gains "the exchange," and the Pawns must fall ultimately under the power of the Rook.

23. Q takes Q	K takes Kt	47. Q to K 7th (ch)	And White wins.
24. Q B P one	Q R to B 3rd

* This last move appears the result of imperfect calculation. Black's object was to check the King with his Q at her B 4th, when the Kt was attacked by the Rook's Pawn, by which he expected to win the Q B P, but, unfortunately, he forgot that the interposition of his adversary's R at K B's 2nd prevented the capture. He would have improved his position had he played the Q to K Kt 4th instead of thus losing time.

† Anything but judicious. What possible advantage could Black propose to herself by this exchange?

‡ This follows of course, and should have been foreseen. The game at this stage is utterly irretrievable.

§ This is not at all exactly the best move, but even that would lose "The exchange" and a Pawn.

‖ White plays very well, exacting to the uttermost the penalty of his opponent's error.

¶ Had White taken the Kt, Black could have drawn the game.

25. B to K 5th ‡	R to K sq §	50. P takes P	K to Q 8th
		White surrenders.

* Mr. Rousseau appears but imperfectly acquainted with the resources of this beautiful opening. Instead of castling, as in a previous game, or taking the pawn, as he did in this, he should have played Q B P one square.

† The last few moves are very well played by White, and up to this point we should certainly take his game for choice.

‡ By thus placing the B in front of the K, White prompts his adversary to make a good move. Either the King should not have been moved to his 2nd, or, being there, the Bishop should not have been stationed where he now is.

§ While the Rook remained on Q square, Black was in some peril, for his enemy threatened to play Kt to Q R 4th, then give up Rook for Knight, and finally mate at Q Kt 6th.

‖ Bad as this is, he appears to have had no better move.

¶ If he had checked at Q 6th, instead of capturing the Pawn, Black would equally have gained a piece.

GAME THE ELEVENTH.

WHITE (Stanley.)	BLACK (Rousseau).	WHITE (Stanley).	BLACK (Rousseau).
1. K P two	Q B P two *	11. B takes Kt	K B P takes B
2. K B P one	K P one	12. Q Kt P one ‡	P takes P §

9. Q Kt P two	Q to K B 3rd	19. Q to K Kt 4th (ch)	K to R sq
10. Q B to K sq	Q B P one	Black resigns.

* It appears by this opening that we were mis-informed as to the players having mutually agreed to play King's pawn two squares for their first move every game.

† This is premature. His first object should have been the development of his forces.

‡ Through the too forward situation of Black's unsupported pawn White is enabled to break them up at once.

§ Any attempt to sustain the Q B P by the Kt's pawn would have been unavailing, for White would instantly have answered with "Q R P two," and thus have gained a still more marked advantage in position.

‖ White evidently sees where the strength of his game lies.

¶ But for this almost incredible blunder Black might yet have retrieved the game. He should have castled, and then the Bishop to Q B 4th would have done him telling service.

DEATH OF RICHARD LATHAM, ESQ., F.L.S., &c.—This gentleman, who was a life governor of Christ's and St. Bartholomew's Hospitals, a life subscriber to St. Ann's Schools, life subscriber to the Licensed Victualler's School and Asylum, fellow of the Linnean Society, and for upwards of a quarter of a century acting partner in the eminent brewery of Sir Henry Meux and Co., died on Saturday morning in the 79th year of his age, at his residences, Bayswater Villa, Bayswater, after a brief illness of a few days.

AWFUL INSTANCE OF SUDDEN DEATH.—On Tuesday Mr. Baker held an inquest at the Wrangler, Four-street, St. Luke's, on the body of Elizabeth Johnson, aged seventy-two years. On Sunday evening, whilst the deceased was making her bed, she suddenly fell on the floor and instantly expired. The deceased had often expressed her conviction that she should die suddenly. A medical gentleman attributed death to a cancer in the stomach of old standing. Verdict, "Died by the visitation of God."

AWFULLY SUDDEN DEATH IN THE STREET.—On Tuesday evening, between seven and eight o'clock, as Dr. Pearse, a gentleman fifty years of age, residing in Marsham-street, Westminster, was returning to his residence from visiting a patient, when in Peter-street, he suddenly staggered and fell on the pavement. Every possible medical assistance was rendered, but all endeavours to restore animation proved ineffectual. The deceased has left a widow and family to deplore the melancholy event.

EVENING MELODIES.—NO. XVIII

Tell me, thou distant bell!
Of [illegible] of speak of pleasure's gone,
Now [illegible] me thy talk to tell!
Thou [illegible] art,

For oh! within my heart,
There lurks a thought, such fix'd distress
That even tears refuse to start,
To ease its bitterness.

And if, while all things sleep,
I sit and listen to [illegible]
Haply the sound may make me weep
Till on I toil on

The glory of my youth
[illegible] away
[illegible]
[illegible]

And I have gone on where
My thoughts rest gladly; none to share
Their coolness, freshest, sunniest bloom,
Ere taint can enter her.

And yet this heart has lov'd.
Him lov'd! Alas! my mournful lot
Would have its deepest sting remov'd,
Could it e'en now love not!

For I have made those dear
On whom my hopes may never dwell.
I would, that I could shed one tear
Toll yet more sad, thou bell!

The world a bruteh around
The woods are glorious in their mirth;
The balm of [illegible] the fountains bound
Upon the fruit, green earth.

Oh! there's a solemn tongue
In all these scenes, which seems to say,
It will not, cannot twice be young;
Then love while yet ye may.

If no one loves me now,
No, when youth's light is in my eyes
I will pass round me when this brow
Is wreathed by sad cy?

What have these pale [illegible]
That no one loves me? What [illegible]
Have I done wrong in this gush of tears—
A sacred radiance broke

In that [illegible]
Thou disappear'st thus, thou!
How I am loved by Thee!

For doubtless, Lord! Thou art
[illegible]
Doubtless Thou canst, though all depart,
Ah, loved ones love us not.

If grief Thy name endears
Teach me beneath that grief to bow!
Thou'st many in this gush of tears—
My heart is lighten'd now!

THE POPULATION OF SWITZERLAND

The population of Switzerland at present amounts to 2,362,200 souls, of whom 1,736,600 are Papists, 1,423,000 Protestants, and 2,000 Jews.

A GREAT SAVING

A short time since a provincial newspaper, speaking of a forest which was going to be enclosed, made the following remark:—"This waste will be a great saving to the country."

HYDRAULIC BED.

A few days ago the following notice was appended to a water-spout in one of the principal streets in Brighton:—"A bed to let up here."

INTRODUCTION OF THE GROWTH OF THE TEA-PLANT INTO FRANCE.

M. Lecoq, the author of a brochure published in 1845, on the culture and preparation of tea in France, has succeeded, not only in acclimatizing this precious plant, but in giving it the character and qualities of Chinese tea. Some difficulties yet remain to be resolved as concerns Pekoe and Souchong; still success has crowned the efforts of M. Lecoq, so that all who wish to try the experiments may do so in all security. The species of tea to be preferred may, perhaps, be demanded. The reply is simple; every variety of tea in use is gathered from a single shrub, the green tea-plant (thea viridis).

A NEW LINE

A fellow in Kentucky, with a railway imagination, wants to know how long it will be before they open the equinoctial line.

MILDNESS OF THE SEASON

A fine dish of white currants was gathered on Christmas-day in the garden of William Ford, Esq., Yeo, near Yeahampton, Worcestire.

LITERATURE IN FRANCE.

There issued from the French press, during the year 1845, 6,521 books of various kinds, 1,405 prints, 492 pieces of music, and 104 maps in all 8,920 works.

THE OREGON TERRITORY

The name of Oregon is derived from oregano, the Spanish word for wild marjoram, the origanum vulgare of Linnæus, which grows abundantly in the western parts of the American continent, and particularly in the disputed territory.

GIGANTIC TREE

On the 22nd ult., a tree was cut down at Rammerscales, Scotland, for the purpose of being converted into sleepers for the Caledonian Railway, of which the following are the dimensions:—Circumference at root where cut off, 11 feet 2 inches; diameter at widest part, 8 feet 9 inches; height, 50 feet; contents of timber, 106 feet. The rings of growth numbered 87; so its age may be estimated at a century. After cutting off 31 feet of butt, there were still three lengths (27 feet) large enough for sawing into sleepers.

EXTREMES.

We are told that extremes never last long; but it would be well if it could be said that extreme poverty did not last long.

BANK AND TALENT.

Many a man may justly thank his talent for his rank, but no man has ever yet been able to return the compliment, by thanking his rank for his talent. When Leonardo da Vinci died, his Sovereign exclaimed, I can make a thousand Lords, but not one Leonardo. Those who value themselves merely on their ancestry, have been compared to potatoes—all that is good of them is underground.

A MONSTER PROJECT

Two French engineers, Messrs. Franchut and Du Motay have projected a most startling mode of communication between Dover and Calais. Their scheme is to accomplish this object by a tunnel, to be composed of a series of iron tubes, of about 4 metres long with a diameter of 2½. The works being commenced simultaneously at both opposite points, when they shall have reach the water, these tubes are to be successively let down from a vessel placed over the boundary of the last tube, the orifice of this tube being closed by a disk in wood. The descending tube is to be suspended from a cable, which attaches itself, on coming in contact, to a sort of wheel fixed in the tube below, and the two having been before adjusted to each other, the locks or springs with which they are provided serve to bolt them together water-tight. When the wooden disk of the one is carried forward to close up the end of the other.

A SUBMARINE RAILWAY.

M. Guillemon, an officer of engineers in France, has conceived the project of making a railway which shall unite the Mediterranean with the Channel—say from Toulon to Charbourg—along which may be transported ships and fleets of war from one point to the other on occasion. The plan, not developed at length, consists in the cutting of a submarine sort of tunnel to be made under the railway which, by an incline of the latter, might at some certain point bring the ship to and upon the level of the line. It remains to be seen how such a project could be worked out, considering the breadth and height of a ship, and also its weight. The latter is estimated at 2,700,000 kilogrammes.

A CHARADE

A Correspondent sends us the following Charade:—

Few Persia's realms was ever known,
My first was to the wise alone
By mystic signs and symbols known;
When mighty Cæsar held his sway
From Cheviot Hills to India's Bay,
My second shone with brightest ray;
And, when as Babylonia shan'd,
My second of my first complain'd,
My whole the conqu'ror of both remain'd.

THE CHINESE COURT

The China Mail of the 30th of November, under the head of "The Court," says:—"In consequence of the general pardon lately declared by the Emperor, a Mantchoo officer has submitted an humble petition to Taoukwang, praying that four Princesses of the blood, who had been exiled under very distressing circumstances, might be reprieved. The Emperor granted the petition favourably, and returns for an answer, 'My will is recorded—be it done.'"

A NEWLY-INVENTED MUSKET BALL

A newly-invented musket ball has been tried at Vincennes, and produced effects similar to those of the cylindro-conical ball. This new missile consists of the ball having a nail run through its centre, and is put into the musket with the point towards the muzzle. This is said to make it carry further and with greater precision.

AN OBSTINATE ECHO.

There are certain letters which no echo will return or express, particularly an S, of which Lord Bacon gives a pleasant instance in a celebrated echo formed by the walls of a ruined church at Pont Charenton, near Paris, where there was an old man who took it to be the work of spirits, and of good spirits too, for, said he, if you call them, the echo will not deliver back the devil's name, but will say va t'en, which in French signifies avoid. By which detail Lord Bacon discovered that echo would not return an S.

A STEAM ENGINE BY POST.

Mr. G. Cartwright, of Preston, received an order, on Friday week, for a miniature steam-engine, on the high-pressure principle, for which he sent to Messrs. Chadburn Brothers, Sheffield; and, strange to say, though the engine had to be built, he received it enclosed in a letter, by post, on Tuesday morning! The engine was complete in every detail, accompanied by a boiler and a fire-grate containing fuel. At the request of several of the astonished beholders, it was kept in motion the whole of Tuesday.

GREEN PEAS IN JANUARY

The mildness of the weather has forced on vegetation to a state that in other years it had not attained in March. In a garden, near West Cowes, there are three rows of peas in blossom and in pod: they were planted in October. Broad beans are to be seen in blossom: and potatoes, which were early planted, are an inch above ground.

LIEBIG WHEN A BOY.

Liebig was distinguished at school as a "booby," the only talent then cultivated in German schools being verbal memory. On one occasion, being sneeringly asked by the master what he proposed to become, since he was so bad a scholar, and answering that he would be a chemist, the whose school burst into a laugh of derision. Not long ago, Liebig saw his old schoolmaster, who feelingly lamented his own former blindness. The only boy in the same school, who ever displayed with Liebig the station of "booby," was one who never could learn his lesson by heart, but was continually composing music, and writing it down by stealth in school. This same individual Liebig lately found at Vienna, distinguished as a composer, and conductor of the Imperial Opera House.

MUSIC.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

As yet no official programme of the forthcoming season has been published, but the arrangements have transpired. The positive engagements are Grisi, Castellan, Persiani, Marini, Labiche, Fornasari, F. Lablache, and Corelli, the artists of last season, and a Signora Sanchioli, a new prima donna, who has been engaged for the ballet, Carlotta Grisi and Lucile Grahn. The dancing of Cerito will depend on "circumstances," but she is engaged. Taglioni and Rubini have such engagements offered to them that they cannot well refuse, but their acceptance is [illegible]

When we have Mr. Lumley's prospectus, we will submit some comments on the conditions necessary for the carrying on of such a lyrical establishment.

The theatre is to be entirely redecorated, and Mr. Stanfield is engaged in painting a drop-scene. The outlay of the manager in this respect is munificent. Whilst the eye will be thus pleased in scenic and house embellishments, it is to be hoped that the ear will be also gratified by musical attractions worthy of the splendid patronage bestowed on her Majesty's Theatre.

Verdi is coming over to superintend the production of an opera on "King Lear," written to display Lablache's histrionic talents. This is the right policy, and we hope other composers will be also invited. The old repertoire is exhausted.

Costa is no longer the Conductor. Balfe has been appointed in his place. Costa's loss is irreparable. We perceive that a letter has been published by Mr. Lumley on the subject; but, until Signor Costa has submitted his reply, we shall not discuss the vexed question between them.

The direction of the Italian Opera House is one of the highest positions that can be held by an intelligent and enterprising Manager. He may be stated to have the power of influencing the progress of art in this country. The mission to advance it would be a noble one, and he might earn for himself a greater name in musical annals than that of a mere successful speculator.

SACRED CONCERTS.

The programme of the fourth concert, given on Wednesday night at Crosby-hall, which was crowded to excess, was excellent. It opened with Dr. Boyce's fine Anthem, "I have surely built thee." A splendid air and chorus adapted from one of Mozart's Masses; Handel's concerted Chorus from "Samson;" "Let their celestial concerts;" a magnificent Chorale of Sebastian Bach, "Jesus hath left the dreary tomb;" and a clever Chorus, "Glory to God," by Miss Mounsey, were the leading choral pieces. Miss Rainforth gave a delightful song by Klücken, "Come, Holy Spirit," and Handel's "Let the bright Seraphim" being encored in the latter. Miss Cubitt was similarly honoured in Pieyer's air, "Free from sorrow." Gärtner's Duet, "Sleep, baby, sleep," sung by Miss Mounsey and Cubitt, was also demanded a second time. Mr. Lockey, the tenor, in an air by Schubert, "Great is Jehovah," and Mr. A. Novello, in a recitative and air, "O Assembly, contrite their sins," in the evening's oratorio music of "Samson," of which was Miss Mounsey's organ solo. The fifth concert is on the 18th proximo.

MR. J. W. ROE'S ENTERTAINMENT OF THE MADRIGAL AND GLEE WRITERS OF ENGLAND AND THEIR COMPOSITIONS.

On Monday night, at the Princes' Concert Room—the prettiest salon in the metropolis devoted to "sweet sounds" Mr. Roe, long known as an enthusiastic amateur, commenced a novel entertainment, under the title at the head of this article. He supposes the composers of England, of all epochs, to be in friendly congress, and, then, the stars of their respective ages discourse most "eloquent music." In this way did Dowland, immortalised by himself as well as by Shakspeare, appear before us, in the first part, in his celebrated "Frogge for Queen Elizabeth;" whilst the ever green and ever lively Tom Cooke, in the second act, sang his splendid glee, "Shades of the Heroes." The quaint Madrigal was also in requisition: and, but for the indisposition of Mr. Francis, catches would have been comprised in the scheme. Mr. Roe had engaged an effective choir in Messrs. Hobbs, E. Chapman, Hatton, the Misses Williams, and the Misses Pyne. Stevens's fairy air from "Oberon" was rapturously encored; as also Goss's glee, "There is beauty on the Mountain," and Wilbye's madrigal, "Flora gave me fairest flowers." This undertaking deserves every success; it offers to the general public new and surprising treats, of which known only to the few amateurs who are members of private clubs and societies. As the executants become familiar with each other's style, the ensemble will be more complete

M. JULLIEN'S CONCERTS

Tuesday, January 27, being the anniversary of Mozart's birthday (he was born in Salzburg, in 1756, and died in Vienna, December 5, 1791), M. Jullien, with good tact, and, much to his credit, without any extra puffing, gave an entire act to the works of the immortal composer. The "Jupiter" symphony, the "Zauberflöte" overture, and selections from operas—the wind instruments playing the voice parts were rapturously applauded.

CONCERTS. Mr. Turner gave his Fifteenth Annual Concert, on Tuesday night, at the Music Hall, Store-street, which was well filled. The selection was principally of the ballad school. The vocalists were the Misses Birch, Rainforth, Cubitt, Lavenue, Steele, Pelham; Messrs. Turner, Stoumbridge, Allen, Brahm, and John Parry; with Miss Dinah Farmer as pianist, and Mr. Richardson as flutist. Mr. J. A. Longhurst was conductor.——A Choral Concert, conducted by Mr. Isaac, with his son as organist, was given on Tuesday, at the Packington School-rooms, Charter-house-square.——Mr. Brahum, assisted by his sons, Mr. Henry Laurent, pianist, and Miss Rainforth, Mille. Schloss, Miss Hobbs, Miss Pearce, &c., had a Concert at the St. Anne's James's, on Thursday night.——The Purcell Club anniversary was held on Friday.——On Thursday the Melodists met, for the first time this season, at Freemasons' Hall.——On Monday Mr. Dando commences his Quartet Concerts.——On Wednesday Madame Dulcken's first second Concert, and Mr. Hullah's Choral Meeting takes place at Exeter Hall.——On Friday "Samson" will be performed by the Sacred Harmonic Society.

SECOND ITALIAN THEATRE. The project that there is a project for a second Italian company, at Covent Garden Theatre, is quite true. In the first instance, the speculators negotiated with Mr. Bunn for Drury Lane Theatre, but could not come to terms, and Covent Garden has been taken, conditionally, for three months. The principal singers will be Persiani, Viardot Garcia, the sister of the Malibran; Guasco and Salvi, tenors; Ronconi and Tamburini, basses. The Brussels Company cannot come over this year, but there is a prospect of a German troupe.

CONTINENTAL MUSICAL NEWS.—Spontini's "Vestale" has been creating a sensation in Berlin, with Jenny Lind as the heroine. Madame Thillon and Liszt have been making tours in Belgium. The Duke of Coburg, brother of Prince Albert, has written an opera for the Gotha Theatre. It is curious that the three great danseuses—Cerito, Dumilâtre, and Fanny Elssler, have been unsuccessful at Turin, Milan, and Rome. The Pope prohibited "Esmeralda," as immoral. Mdlle. Andreanoff, a Russian danseuse, is now the star of the Scala.

DRURY-LANE THEATRE. Mr. Wallace, the composer of "Maritana," takes a benefit on Thursday night, on the 50th representation of his opera. His will perform on the piano-forte, and be assisted in a concert by Signor Marras, the Italian tenor, Sainton, the violinist, &c. Macfarren's "Don Quixote" is underlined for Tuesday. Flora Fabbri closed her engagement on Saturday, with a benefit. Her success has been immense. A new ballet by Barrez, in rehearsal, in which Mdlle. Maria, of the Académie Royale, Mdlle. Neodot, of the Madrid Imperial Theatre, and M. Desplaces, of the Académie Royale, will appear. Beaudet's opera is in active rehearsal. It is reported that Mr. Bunn has cleared upwards of £10,000 since Christmas.

THE THEATRES.

FRENCH PLAYS

The excellence of Madame Albert's acting continues to attract full audiences at the St. James's Theatre. On Monday evening, she appeared in a little piece, "Un Mot d'Attente," of which the whole burden rested on her shoulders. She portrayed the feelings of a wife whose husband has gone to a ball without her (the jealousies, tempers wrongs, and subsequent reconciliation at finding her self-sacrifices were entirely without foundation in a most charming manner. Pieces of this kind, in which one actor remains on the stage throughout, have never met with any great success in the English theatres; albeit, we believe, a translation of this very sketch was performed by Mrs. Stirling a year or two ago, and called "A Night of Suspense." We do not know whether to attribute the indifferent reception these monologues meet with, from us, to a absence of the patience and endurance of a French audience, or a lack of that extreme delicacy of acting that can portray the slightest nuance of character on the part of the performer; but his majority of attempts made to adapt these scenes have turned out little better than failures.

On Wednesday, the beautiful drama of "Marie, ou la Perle de Savoie," which appeared two years ago at all the minor theatres in London under the title of Marie, in its musical form as "Linda di Chamouni," was played for Madame Albert's benefit. The original piece, produced, if our memory serves us correctly, at the Adelphi, was called "La Grace de Dieu," taking its title from a subject of the same name which was very popular eight or ten years back in Paris—the air running through the piece, and producing many of the situations. The play was highly successful some seasons ago at the St. James's Theatre, when Madame Albert also played the heroine: but although produced at so many houses in London, did not achieve any extraordinary triumph—at least in comparison with its run at Paris. This depended in some measure upon the difficulty of finding an actress endowed with all the attributes requisite for realising the part of Marie. Mrs. Keeley was the only one who could have rendered the character with proper effect, and she was not then available. Of those Maries who appeared in it, the best, in our opinion, was Mrs. R. Honner, then at the Surrey.

Some changes were made in the cast of Marie the other evening: we cannot altogether say for the better. M. Carigny, to be sure, was magnificent as the Commandant, but we missed the honest, natural pathos of M. Lienard in Pierrot, sustained on Wednesday by M. Narcisse. And Mdlle. Anna Grave did not come up to the pleasant, good-tempered Mdlle. Avenel, as the always hungry Chevalon. We do not mean to say that the characters were not well played, but we had, unluckily, seen them in better hands. As a whole, however, the piece went off admirably, and the tears of the audience, in the fourth and fifth acts, were the best tributes to the excellence of Madame Albert's acting

Her Majesty and Prince Albert honoured the theatre with their presence. They remained until the end of the drama, and appeared to take a deep interest in its progress. The house was well filled, if not absolutely crowded.

DRURY LANE

On Monday evening, the Queen and Prince Albert paid a visit to this theatre, the performances being "Maritana," the Risley Exhibition, and the Pantomime. Not being expected, the management was thrown into some little confusion by the arrival of the Royal party; but, at last, everything was properly arranged. The Prince appeared to take great interest in the performances of the Risleys, frequently applauding them warmly; and, at the end of the evening, expressed his satisfaction to Mr Harley, at all he had witnessed. It was observed by several who take delight in never moving their lorgnettes from the direction of the Royal box when it is occupied, that the Prince laughed heartily at the "curry" joke in the pantomime.

The general business continues to be very good; not more so, however, than the liberality of the management deserves, with so many attractions in the programme.

Mr. Macready reappeared on Monday night at the Princess' Theatre, and was received with an enthusiasm scarcely less than that which greeted him on his début at this house. The play was "King Lear," and he was well supported by Mr. Wallack, Mrs. Terman, and Mrs. Stirling, as Edgar, Regan, and Cordelia. Any further notice is superfluous, as we could only repeat the commendation we have before awarded to the tragedian and those supporting him.

The drama of "Leoline," to be produced at the Adelphi, on Monday, is written by Mr. H. Holl, of the Haymarket Theatre, the author also of "Grace Huntley," a domestic drama that was very successful, some years ago, at the same house.

The "Crickets on the Hearths," as Miss Stoakley would express herself, appear to be gradually chirping themselves out, at the different theatres. Some have departed altogether, and others have come down to half-price, or three nights a week. We expect that the Lyceum one will hold its place the longest: to judge from the notices, there appears to be little diminution in its attraction, as every seat is nightly occupied.

The "William Tell" of Sheridan Knowles has been produced, with very great success, at Sadler's Wells, with the same uniform excellence of acting, and attention to general stage-effect, that characterise all the plays produced under this praiseworthy management. It is gratifying to see the exertions of Mrs. Warner and Mr Phelps in the cause of the legitimate drama so warmly responded to. Night after night their little theatre is filled, literally, to the ceiling, by most respectable, and evidently appreciating audiences—a proof that whatever is really well done will always meet with generous patronage. To be thus well done, every point of detail must be attended to. If stage-managers would sometimes sit amongst the audience, and hear their remarks on points considered of no importance behind the scenes, they would be surprised at the perception of the public, even respecting the most technical appliances of the theatre. At Sadler's Wells everything is excellent; and even the Pantomime evidences very great industry and a departure from all those conventional absurdities which might be built up as a fitting monument for the almost defunct entertainment in question.

The engagement of the Misses Cushman at the Haymarket has been renewed, through an arrangement with Mr. Calcraft, the manager of the Dublin Theatre, where the two sisters will next appear. "Romeo and Juliet" is still the great attraction.

A new ballet is in daily rehearsal at Drury Lane. In the "Diable à Quatre" the parts played by Mademoiselle Dabas and M. Delferier, are now sustained by Madame Guichet and M. A. Webster.

We hear that Mr. Buckstone's scheme for the new theatre in Leicester-square progresses most satisfactorily. Several shares have been taken by capitalists in New York. The situation is certainly one of the best in London; and, in our opinion, a well conducted theatre, of moderate and commodious size, would stand a fair chance of turning out a satisfactory investment.

EPITOME OF NEWS.—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

We have received Ceylon papers to the 16th December. They bring the intelligence of the arrival of Sir James Emerson Tennent and family at Colombo, in the steamer Hindostan. All the journals of the island augur great advantages to the administration of affairs in the colony by the appointment of Sir J. E. Tennent. Subscriptions had been entered into for the establishment of a cathedral church at Colombo.

A letter from Oporto, of the 13th instant, says:—"This place is very gay at present. We have an excellent Italian opera, with Mdlle. Rocca, Velluti, Russo, Alba, &c. Hernani, Favourita, Lombardos, have been in scena hitherto, and we anticipate fresh treats. We have besides a celebrated company of funambulists, and lately a superlative circus of horsemanship, besides hitherto and private balls. These things suit the Portuguese better than speculating on railways."

A letter from Lucca states that the Hereditary Prince of Lucca and his illustrious bride had received on the 23rd ult., at the small town of Compagna, on the frontier of the Principality, with enthusiasm. The horses were taken out of their carriage, which was drawn into the town by the inhabitants. A similar reception was given them at Lucca, which was illuminated for three successive nights.

Professor Dieterich, historical painter and instructor in the School of Art, at Stuttgart, died in that city on the 14th inst., in the 54th year of his age. He was born at Silberach, of poor parentage, and having given early proofs of his talent, was placed by the Government under the tuition of Forchart Wächter, and afterwards sent to Rome to complete his education. His best works in oil are the altar-piece in the Catholic Church of Stuttgart—the resurrection of Christ—and the patriotic Abraham, in the public picture-gallery; he had also produced some good frescoes.

Prince William Frederick of the Netherlands died last week, at the Hague, in the 59th year of his age, having been born on the 22nd August, 1797. The deceased Prince was the only son of Prince Frederick of the Netherlands, who has two daughters, Princess Louisa, born August 5th, 1828, and Princess Mary, born July 5th, 1841.

Letters from St. Petersburg, of the 15th inst., announce the arrival of the Emperor on the 11th. They also state that accounts had been received from the seat of war in the Caucasus, according to which several affairs had taken place between the Russians and Circassians in the Cherkess were victorious.

A letter from Frankfort, dated Jan. 24, says that Ronge has been forbidden by the Saxon Government to enter any part of the Saxon territories; and that the authorities of the Electorate of Hesse have received orders not to allow any clergyman, belonging to the German Catholic Dissenters, to take up his abode in their respective districts.

We learn from Posen, January 13, that fresh arrests are daily taking place in that Duchy. They are principally Poles. Some of them have been conducted to Grandenz.

His Royal Highness the Crown Prince of Wurtemburg has left Rome, on a visit to the Empress of Russia at Palermo. His Roya. Highness intends staying in that city until the departure from thence of the Imperial Family of Russia, with whom he will return to Rome. The accounts from several provinces in the Roman States are unsatisfactory. At Pergola and Imola several conflicts have taken place between the populace and civic authorities, which the military were called on to quell. At Forli the inspector of police was shot dead in broad daylight, whilst conversing with an officer. No trace of the murderer has yet been discovered.

A frightful crime was committed a few days since at Lédé-le-Grand (France). A woman, named Curry, cut off the heads of her two children, one aged three months, and the other about three years. She afterwards inflicted some wounds on her own person, but they are not serious.

A letter from Nieuport, of the 21st inst., says:—"The Vistula, which last year caused so much damage by overflowing its banks, has again this year been productive of injury. All the plain on the right bank of the river from this place to Dordrecht has been submerged for the last week. As far as the eye can reach all is under water. The villages of Treal and Montan only show their roofs, and it was with the utmost difficulty that the inhabitants were able to save their cattle

Mr. Marshall, the British Consul at Calais for the last twenty-four years, died on Friday (last week), after several days' illness. He has left a widow and a large family to regret his loss. He was much respected in his situation, and the Government has lost a useful servant.

The Akhbar of Algiers has a letter of the 6th instant from Djidjili, stating that about six in the evening of the preceding day, lightning fell upon the Vedis blockhouse, and caused four cases of ammunition to explode. The place and every article in it was destroyed, and the ten men who were on duty at it were all dreadfully burnt or mutilated by the splinters. One gunner died the same night, and five more were expected to have the same fate.

The Augsburg Gazette of the 21st has the following under the head of Berlin: "The French Government recently attempted to induce the Prussian Cabinet to recognise Don Isabella, and recommend to her a marriage with the Count de Trapani. We learn that our Cabinet, which in this affair takes common cause with Russia and Austria, has given an evasive answer. It appears, however, disposed to discontinue the pecuniary aid which, concurrently with other powers, it has hitherto afforded to Don Carlos."

A few days ago the most celebrated authors of Vienna presented to the Emperor of Austria the plan of a scientific association, whereby a path would be opened for the establishment of an academy. This was accompanied by a petition for his Majesty's sanction to the proposed institution.

A Trieste letter of the 18th, says:—"A Greek steam-packet just come into port, announces that an English packet on her way from Malta has gone ashore on the point of the island of Ithaca, and lies in a dangerous position, as the ground was rocky. Every measure has been taken for endeavouring to save her."

A printer of Wurtzburg has been arrested for having printed an almanack in 1842, in which the name of the Bishop of Wurtzburg is placed before that of the King and Royal Family of Bavaria.

ARTISTS' AMATEUR PERFORMANCE, ST. JAMES'S THEATRE.

A very attractive performance was given at this theatre on Tuesday evening, in aid of the funds of the Artists' General Benevolent Institution. This excellent Society was founded in 1814, "for the relief of all Distressed Artists, whether Members or Subscribers to its Funds or not; merit in distress constituting the claims to its benevolence." Such is the broad and proper field for "all mankind's concern" [illegible] and how frequently it is called into exercise may be inferred from the testimony of the Committee for conducting the above performance—"that those most flattered by popular applause have, by adverse circumstances, been brought within the influence and aid of this Institution." This plain experience must appeal strongly to the sympathies of all who "enjoy the luxury of doing good."

Over and above this incentive, the performance of Tuesday promised a high

treat, which was fully realised. The several actors were painters and draughtsmen; and, considering how far success on the stage depends upon artistic feeling, the expectation of a good performance by a company of Artists was reasonable enough. Their objects were worthy of association with each other: to borrow from a writer of sublime truth, each purpose, like the natural charity of the sun, illuminated the other without obscuring itself.

The play chosen for Tuesday night was Morton's comedy of "The School of Reform," a piece of other dramatic times than our own, and much cavilled at by critics; but, in this instance, well chosen for the genius of the leading amateur.

The part of Tyke, considering its numerous difficulties, was admirably filled by Mr. F. W. Topham, whose genius has occasionally illustrated our pages: the Commons Cabin, in our journal of last week, was this artist's masterly delineation. With a vivid recollection of the Tyke of Emery and Rayner, and a traditional shadowing of Mathews's performance of the character, it was played on Tuesday night by Mr. Topham with great success: the part abounds with gushes of intense feeling; but in these, the "artist" never overstepped, nor, on the other hand, did he fall into tameness; these being the Scylla and Charybdis of amateur actors. It was not, strictly, a conventionally sustained performance, throughout; but, it was full of genius, and love of the art, and was loudly, but judiciously applauded.

Lord Avondale was sensibly played by Mr. Angell; as was the up-hill part of Frederick by Mr. Tennie. Mr. Fermont was cleverly filled by Mr. Hamerton: his by-play was admirable; and this is a rare amateur accomplishment. General Tarragon was characteristically stormed through by Mr. F. Holl; and, among the minor characters, that of Peter, the frigid servant, was an artist-like bit of acting, by Mr. J. Wilson. Mrs. Taylcure led the female caste, and acted with her accustomed effect as Mrs. Nicely.

After the comedy, the bustling farce of "A Day Well Spent" was spiritedly played; the truant shopmen, Bolt and Match, being Messrs. J. Wilson and F. Holl: the former threw a spice of poor Wrench into his performance.

The evening's entertainments closed with the erudite burlesque of "Bombastes Furioso;" the General by George Cruikshank, who played with great gusto, and gave the absurdities of the character most effectively: he was admirably dressed, and more than once reminded us of his own exquisite illustrations of the printed burlesque. He was well supported by Mr. M. Wood, as the King, and Mr. Angell's Fusbos. The performance kept the audience in a broad laugh from first to last.

Our artist has illustrated the first scene, where Bombastes presents "this watch and silken string" to the enthroned sovereign.

The house was entirely filled; half the audience being elegantly dressed ladies. Besides several of our first-rate artists, there was a liberal sprinkling of men of letters.

We are happy to learn that the proceeds are likely to prove a very handsome addition to the fund of the Artists' Institution. All the arrangements of the Committee for conducting the performance are entitled to the highest praise.

We should not omit to add that the several pieces were admirably dressed; and there was an artistic attention to costume, which is too rarely observed by professional actors. The theatre, by the way, has been entirely renovated: it certainly boasts of the most picturesque proscenium in the metropolis.

"THE MOOZOFFER," STEAM INDIAMAN.

This fine steam-ship, built by Fletcher of Limehouse, for the service of the East India Company, was launched from Hog-yard, on Tuesday last. The Chairman and Directors of the East India Company were present, with their ladies, to witness the ceremony, which took place a few minutes before two o'clock, at the top of high water; when, every thing being in readiness, the naming of the vessel and dashing a bottle of wine at her bows, was performed by Miss Willock, the daughter of Sir Henry Willock, the Chairman of the East India Company; and the few remaining props which supported the ship having been removed, the Moozoffer glided slowly and majestically down the slip into the river, amidst the enthusiastic cheers of the spectators.

The new vessel is a very handsome craft, 256 feet in length, or 25 feet longer than either of the Royal West India Mail Packets. She is of 1440 tons burthen, and will be fitted with engines, each of 500-horse power, by Messrs. Seaward and Capel. Her entire cost will be £100,000.

FASHIONS FOR FEBRUARY.

As the season of fêtes and balls has not yet commenced, we can speak of fashions but by anticipation. Preparation is being made on all sides for the gaieties of the ensuing month, and it is then that the novelties which have been silently germinating at the principal Magasins de Mode will burst into full bloom. Already the carriages of those leaders of fashion who have arrived in town, may be seen waiting for their fair occupants at Foudlon and Lamb's, and other penetralia of La Mode. We will now give our readers some idea of the weighty decisions to which the conferences held within have led.

Bonnets for the promenade in the ensuing month will still retain the Pamela form; but velvet in dark colours will soon cease to be the favourite material. It will be replaced by terry velvet and satin in light shades, of which the favourite are slate colour, Persian lilac, pearl grey, pale pink, and sky-blue. The trimmings are as light and simple as possible; those of the inside of the bonnet must be in a full colour, care being taken, as we need hardly remark, that it should be one which harmonizes well with the hair and the complexion of the fair wearer.

Evening coiffures are in velvet, covered and trimmed with blonde, with galoons of gold and silver, or gold and silver lace. These head-dresses, which are styled "Odettte," "Maintenon," "Medicis," "Andalouse," &c., are adapted to the face without difficulty. Wreaths of flowers have always been, and always will be, in vogue; for nothing can be more becoming, more simple, and more pleasing to the eye. They harmonise equally well with the fair luxuriant ringlets of a blonde, or with the classical braids and severer style of coiffure of a brune. It may be added that the perfection to which the manufacture of flowers is now arrived, the lightness and flexibility of the stem, from which branch forth leaves and blossoms, that look as though they had been just plucked from the fields, gives an additional merit to this favourite style of head-dress.

MORNING DRESSES are made in silks, with a satin stripe or pattern. The favourite colours are deep blue, violet, China green, or black, all glacés, with different shades. They are trimmed with bands and bows of velvet, and in the midst of each nœud is a marcasite button.

PELISSES have revers and trimmings of velvet, of the same colour as the principal shade of the silk; others are fastened all the way down, with bows enlarging towards the bottom, and buttons.

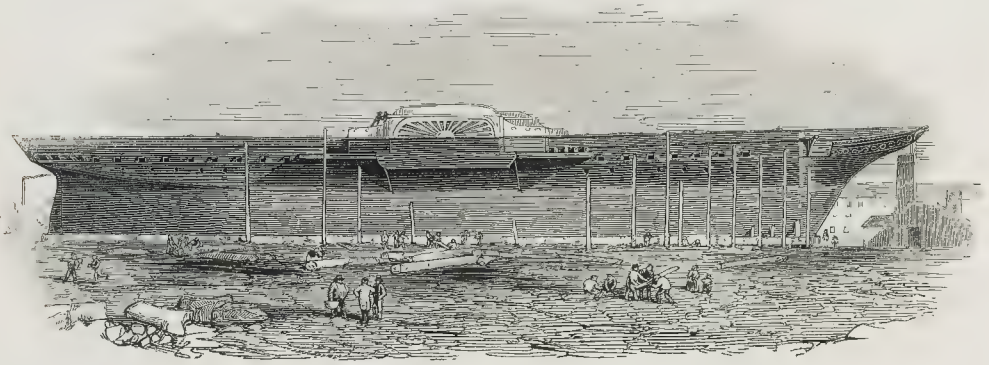
FASHIONS FOR FEBRUARY.

FOR DINNER DRESSES, rich damask silks, in pink, white, or blue, will be preferred to all others. They are trimmed à la Louis XIV., with flounces of lace or blonde laid on nearly flat, except where looped up at intervals with bows of ribbon. Others are trimmed with bows of ribbon en tablier.

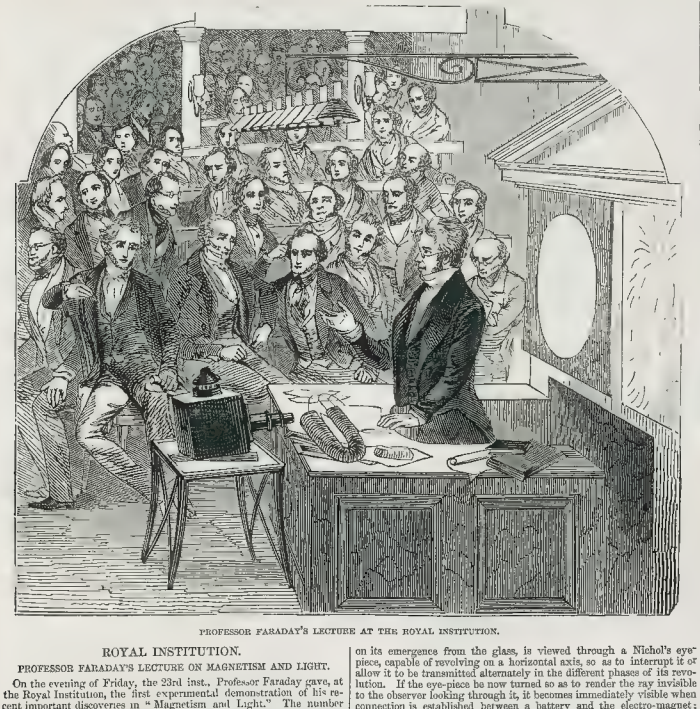
EVENING DRESSES, in coloured damask silk, are trimmed with three rows of tulle puffings, in gradations of width, on which are placed, at intervals, bows of narrow satin ribbon. Another form of evening costume very much in vogue is a dress of China-green satin, trimmed with flounces of black lace, with a heading of ribbons, à la vieille; or, one of mauve satin, trimmed with three flounces of black lace, looped up, à la Camargo, with ribbons shaded off from the full mauve colour to a deep violet.

FASHIONS FOR FEBRUARY.

We must not omit also to quote a very favourite style of pelisse, or morning dress. It is made in damask silk, either brown, broché black, grass green, broché in dark green, or violet, broché black; and is trimmed with steel buckles and velvet ribbon.



"THE MOOZOFFER," STEAM INDIAMAN.



PROFESSOR FARADAY'S LECTURE AT THE ROYAL INSTITUTION.

ROYAL INSTITUTION.

PROFESSOR FARADAY'S LECTURE ON MAGNETISM AND LIGHT.

On the evening of Friday, the 23rd inst., Professor Faraday gave, at the Royal Institution, the first experimental demonstration of his recent important discoveries in "Magnetism and Light." The number of visitors was so great, that it was found requisite to open the doors of the Theatre before the usual time: the members' benches were immediately occupied, and many of the members were compelled to take their seats in the central space, close upon the lecture-table.

Professor Faraday prefaced his lecture with a very modest apology for its bareness of experimental interest; adding, notwithstanding the great importance of the subject, the illustrations of it were not of that brilliancy which characterises many other scientific demonstrations. Despite this warning, Professor Faraday, by aid of some beautiful experiments, proceeded to invest the subject with very great interest. We can, of course, give little beyond a brief abstract of this important communication.

Prof. Faraday has long been persuaded that among the various powers of nature, or physical forces, as they are termed, although producing different classes of effects in their operations on matter, there exists a close relation—that, in fact, they are connected by a common origin, have a reciprocal dependence on one another, and are capable, under certain conditions, of being converted the one into the other. Œrsted, in 1820, showed that electricity could be made a source of magnetism; and Faraday subsequently proved that magnetism, combined with motion, might be made the source of electricity. That there existed a relation between these powers and light, also has long been a prevailing opinion amongst philosophers; but all efforts to detect this relation have been unsuccessful until within a few months past, when Prof. Faraday, by a long-continued series of experiments, discovered that a ray of light may be electrified and magnetised, and that lines of magnetic force may be rendered luminous. The experiment by which the link of connection between two great natural forces is established is this:—

A ray of light issuing from the argand lamp is first polarised in the horizontal plane by reflection from a glass mirror, and is then made to pass through a prism of "heavy glass," which is in its turn placed before the poles of a very powerful electro-magnet. The polarised ray, on its emergence from the glass, is viewed through a Nichol's eye-piece, capable of revolving on a horizontal axis, so as to interrupt it or allow it to be transmitted alternately in the different phases of its revolution. If the eye-piece be now turned so as to render the ray invisible to the observer looking through it, it becomes immediately visible when connection is established between a battery and the electro-magnet; and it again becomes invisible when the circuit is interrupted. Thus it is evident that the plane of polarisation has been changed; that the beam of light has, like an electrified wire, arranged itself at right angles to the magnet, thus following the universal law. The effect is produced, though in a less degree, when the polarised ray is subjected to the action of a permanent magnet, and it is also weaker when a single pole only is employed. The magnetic action causes the plane of polarization of the polarized ray to rotate, for the ray becomes again visible by turning the eye-piece to a certain extent. The direction of this rotation, when the magnetic influence issues from the south pole, is right-handed; that is to say, the polarized ray rotates in the same direction as the circulation of the currents of positive electricity, or those hypothetical currents which, according to Ampere's theory, circulate in the substance of a steel magnet. The rotation is invariably, in one direction; dependent, however, on the direction of the ray, and the magnetic force. In this respect, it differs from those bodies which exhibit the phenomena of circular polarization—for in some of these, as is known, the rotation takes place to the right, in others to the left. When such substances are used, the natural and the superinduced powers tend to produce either the same or opposite rotations.

Prof. Faraday mentioned, incidentally, that the prism of "heavy glass" which he employed on this occasion, was a portion of a quantity manufactured a considerable time since by himself, in conjunction with Sir John Herschel, for the use of the Royal Observatory. The ingenious Professor also attributed the success of his experiments, in great measure, to the accidental circumstance of his using a prism of this peculiar quality of glass.

Prof. Faraday, at the close of his lecture, acknowledged the service rendered by Mr. Darker, who managed the optical apparatus; and to whose skill and attention the success of the experiments was in a great degree to be ascribed.

GERALD GAGE; OR, THE SECRET.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SUSAN HOPLEY," ETC.

CHAPTER V.

"WHAT an idle dog you're grown, Gage," said young Marmaduke Vane, on entering Gerald's room, one morning, and finding him, as was usual of late, sitting in his dressing-gown and slippers, with his knees crossed, and smoking a cigar. On the table before him lay a hunting-whip, and a shot belt, a pair of foils, and a boxing-glove. There were, also, materials for writing, and a sheet of paper, with the beginning of a letter, which had proceeded as far as, "My dear Emily, I am really ashamed of my long s——," below which words appeared the sketch of a beautiful setter, called Rover, the original of which portrait was lying at the young man's feet. The walls of the room were hung with shooting and hunting-coats, guns and pistols; interspersed with engravings, chiefly of horses celebrated on the turf, or boxers eminent in the ring; and on the mantel-piece lay a variety of cigar-cases, mingled with tubes of various sizes and shapes—short and long, crooked and straight—intended for the purpose of smoking; together with a dice-box, and sundry packs of cards. "How do you expect to get through your examination, I should like to know? Why, I suspect you've forgotten what the inside of a book is made of!"

"Pretty nearly," said Gerald, in a desponding tone. "Is that to-day's paper you have in your hand? Just let me look at it!"

"What do you think Willoughby said last night?" said Vane, giving him the journal; "he said, 'that though you were always borrowing everybody's paper, you never read anything but the Births, Deaths, and Marriages.'"

"He does me too much honour," said Gerald, "I never read even so much!"

"What do you read, then?" said Vane, looking at him with unaffected curiosity.

"The Deaths!" replied Gerald.

"Oh, I have it," exclaimed Vane; "I have it! You're expecting a legacy! I hope it's a plumper!"

"A few hundred thousand pounds," answered Gerald.

"The deuce!" cried Vane. "You don't say so! What a lucky dog you are!"

"I should be, if I'd got it," answered Gerald; "but 'there's many a slip,' you know."

"What ar'n't you sure of it?" asked Vane.

"Oh, yes, quite sure," replied Gerald; who, seeing how he was rising in importance, had not resolution to say he was not; "sure enough, if I live; but one may die, you know."

"Oh, hang dying!" said Vane. "Nobody dies that's got a hundred thousand pounds!"

"That's exactly what I complain of," said Gerald.

"Oh, but I mean when one's young. He's an old fellow, I suppose."

"O.t, yes," said Gerald, "and has been many years in India. That ought to shake a man's constitution."

"Oh, he'll die," said Vane, "never fear; he'll pop off some morning when you're not thinking of it."

"He'll find it difficult to do that, I fancy," replied Gerald, with a half smile.

"Then, I suppose, the truth is, you don't mean to take orders," continued Vane.

"Why, I don't much think I shall," answered Gerald! "I always had an inclination for the army; and if I could get a commission, I believe I had better indulge my fancy than tie myself to a profession I don't like."

"Get somebody to recommend you at the Horse Guards, and purchase a commission," said Vane.

"I have no money," replied Gerald; "I may be the master of a million in six months' time; but at present I haven't a rap."

"Won't the old fellow come down?" asked Vane.

"I daren't ask him," answered Gerald. "He's eccentric, and such a request might ruin me."

"Whew!" said Vane, "That's the way with them all. They're the devil to deal with, those old fellows. But why don't you try the Jews?"

"I've no means of convincing them of the reality of my expectations," answered Gerald. "They're afraid of being done; and my hands are so tied, that I daren't take any step to satisfy them."

"Is there nobody you can get to answer for you?" said Vane. "Nobody," replied Gerald ; "the old fellow's been so close—stop though," added he, "what if I could get the lawyer that made the will?"

"The very man!" cried Vane! Huzzah! Where does he live? What's his name?"

"I don't know where he lives!" answered Gerald, eluding the last question, "but I can easily find out. You think he'll do?"

"Think! Certain of it," replied Vane, "Is it in London he lives?"

"Yes, that much I know," replied Gerald.

"Then come along with me!" said Vane; "I'm off to night, and I'll drive you up in my tilbury. Besides, I know an honest fellow—honest for a Jew, I mean—that'll do your business for you capitally."

The remaining preliminaries were soon settled ; and, at the appointed hour, the two young men started for London. As the name was not a common one, Gerald had little difficulty in discovering that Mr. Pirlig was to be found in Lincoln's Inn, and, accordingly, thither he bent his steps. The lawyer was busy at his desk, happily oblivious of his ill-starred journey to Bath, and his own imprudence, when he was frighted from his propriety by the announcement that Mr. Gerald Gage was in the next room, and begged to see him immediately. "Gerald Gage!" said he to the clerk who had entered with the intelligence; "Did you say I was at home?"

"Yes, Sir," replied the clerk. "The gentleman says he wishes to see you on particular business."

"Humph!" said Mr. Pirlig, with a sigh. "Show him in Smith! What the deuce can he want with me?" thought he. To tell him more about the will I suppose. He'll think he has me under his thumb, and that he can screw anything out of me he pleases. And how the plague can I help myself, if he chooses to use the power he's got?" And as these agreeable reflections passed rapidly through the lawyer's mind, he rose to receive the visitor, to whom he offered a chair, with an air of as much complaisance and welcome as he could assume on so short a notice.

"I dare say, Mr. Pirlig," said Gerald, "I need not remind you of our meeting in the Bath coach last December; nor of the conversation that passed on that occasion."

"I remember the circumstance you allude to perfectly, Sir," said Mr. Pirlig, "and allow me to add that it is not without great pain that I remember it. It was the first time that I was ever guilty of such an indiscretion, and I hope you will believe me, when I assure you that it will be the last."

"Did you succeed in finding our fellow traveller?" enquired Gerald.

"No, Sir," replied Pirlig. "I made every enquiry, but without success. However, I trust he has made no ill use of my imprudent disclosure. I have no reason to think that he has."

"Then you have heard nothing from Mr. Livingstone on the subject?"

"Nothing, Sir."

"Have you seen him lately?"

"Not very lately," replied the lawyer, "I only go, of course, when he sends for me."

"What sort of a man is he?" enquired Gerald.

"A good man enough, I believe," replied Mr. Pirlig, "but eccentric, obstinate, suspicious, and disliking every body that he thinks has a design upon his property, or entertains hopes of succeeding to it. Not from avarice, but rather from an ill opinion and contempt for human nature."

"But I meant," said Gerald, almost blushing, "what sort of a man is he in person, age, health?"

"Oh," replied Pirlig, "I should think he's upwards of seventy; and as for his health, you know, he was a long while in India, and I needn't observe how that tells against a man when he comes to be in years; for," thought the cunning lawyer, "the nearer I represent the prize the more cautious he'll probably be, for fear of losing it!"

"Well, then," said Gerald, "altogether, I suppose you consider me pretty secure of stepping into this property before many years are over my head?"

"I do, Sir," said Mr. Pirlig; "I've no doubt of it, provided you keep your own counsel, and that he never suspects you know anything of the business. Perhaps before many months."

"He shall never have any reason to suspect it from me, you may rely on it," said Gerald. "But you see, Mr. Pirlig, in the meantime, whilst the corn grows, the steed starves. I want money, and you must help me to get a little."

"I, Sir!" exclaimed Mr. Pirlig, with a look of alarm. "Why, if I were but to hint such a thing to Mr. Livingstone, the business would be all up. He'd throw his will into the fire, and, most likely, kick me out of the house, into the bargain."

"I'm well aware of that," replied Gerald, "and I don't want you to hint it to Mr. Livingstone. What I want you to do is to stand godfather to me. You must promise and vow three things in my name: first, that I am the heir to a great estate; secondly, that the present incumbent is stricken in years, and sickly and asthmatic, with a dropsical diathesis; and thirdly, that I am a right honest fellow, who will pay my debts handsomely as soon as I come into my property."

"You're jesting, I'm sure, Sir." said Mr. Pirlig. "You wouldn't ask me to do such a thing."

"I was never more serious in my life," replied Gerald; "and I think I've every right to ask you to do such a thing. You say, yourself, that you have no doubt I shall inherit the property in a few years at furthest; and where's the harm of helping me to a little cash in the meantime, when a few words can do it."

"I'm sure, Sir, I'd had any money to spare that could be of any use to you," said Mr. Pirlig, "I should be most happy; but, setting every other consideration aside, to go and put another person in possession of such a secret—surely, you must see it's the height of imprudence."

"Not at all," replied Gerald. "As soon as that other person has lent me money it will be as much his interest as it is ours to keep the secret. Besides, you needn't say what property it is that I expect. You've only to satisfy the person in question that my prospects are what I represent them."

"But you'll get no money under such circumstances, Sir," objected Mr. Pirlig, "except upon enormous interest."

"That may be," replied Gerald. "I dare say the interest will be enormous; but it isn't much I want—only a few hundred pounds to purchase a commission, and fit me out. A thousand would do it abundantly."

"A thousand pounds, Sir," said Pirlig; "it's easy to talk of a thousand pounds; but a thousand pounds isn't so easily got."

"But, I tell you I can get it," replied Gerald, "if you'll only do what I require."

"I couldn't—indeed I couldn't, Sir," said Pirlig.

"Nonsense! Mr. Pirlig," exclaimed Gerald, contemptuously; "what's the use of affecting such scruples after what has passed. Is there any thing worse in helping me to a little cash for an honourable purpose, which you know I shall pay, than in betraying your client's private affairs to a stranger in a stage coach. I should like to know, if the two peccadilloes were placed in a balance, which would weigh the heaviest?"

"You're hard upon me, Sir," said Pirlig; "but you must remember that confidence in business was unpremeditated—a mere lapsus linguæ, whilst this would be a deliberate act."

"That makes no difference in the result," observed Gerald. "Your lapsus linguæ, as you are pleased to call it, might have been, may still be, as injurious to me as if you had premeditated the thing for a twelvemonth. You've ridden along me a great comfort, and you are bound in justice to make me some compensation. Besides, I'm desperate; money I must have; and, in a word, if you won't assist me, I'll go to Mr. Livingstone myself, and explain my situation. It's true, I dare say he'll alter his will if I do; but he can hardly refuse a thousand pounds to a man for whom he intended a million, and the son of his old friend too; and, situated as I am, the thousand is almost as much an object of desire now, as the million at an indefinite period."

"Will you give me till to-morrow morning to think of it?" said Pirlig, seeing the determination of the other to carry his point.

"Very well!" said Gerald; "I will give you leave to think; though the delay is useless, seeing the thing must be done. I will be with you, then, at ten, to-morrow; and I'll bring the man that's to lend the money with me."

"No, Sir," said Pirlig, "don't do that. If you must have the money, I think I can get somebody to advance it at a cheaper rate than you can get it yourself. I'll consider of it between this and then."

"Now you talk reason, Mr. Pirlig," said Gerald. "Good bye, then, till to-morrow," and the unwelcome visitor departed.

"Yes," said the unlucky lawyer to himself, after maturely weighing the pros and cons—"yes, although if he shouldn't live to inherit the property, I shall never see my thousand pounds again, I believe it will be more prudent to lend it him myself, at a legal interest, and take his bond, than risk my professional reputation by letting the secret go any further. Besides, I shall be laying him under an obligation; and, if he gets the money, I may find my account in it hereafter." So, when Gerald called on the following morning, after expatiating largely on the difficulty he should have in raising the sum on the one hand, and the trouble he had to see gentlemen cheated, as they invariably were, by the money-lending craft, on the other, terminating his discourse with hinting of the interest he could not help feeling for a young gentleman so peculiarly situated—Mr. Pilrig consented to advance the required amount; and Gerald returned to his hotel with a thousand pounds in his pocket, to begin the world with.

HUNNYBUN AND VENDEN'S NEW PATENT SAFETY OMNIBUS.

Every improvement in our street carriages is worthy of notice, in the proportion that it contributes to the safety and accommodation of the public. The above omnibus, just patented by Messrs. Hunnybun and Venden, is a good specimen of this advance: it is a tastefully and conveniently built carriage, remarkable for its low construction, thus affording easy access; so that passengers may step at once from the road-way to the floor of the carriage, without the aid of a step.

The draught is considerably reduced; the peculiar, but simple construction permitting the fore-wheels to be six inches higher than usual; and the eccentric lock enabling it to turn completely round in a hansom. The Omnibus runs particularly light, and free from noise. It is handsomely trimmed; and, both internally and exteriorly, is a great improvement upon the usual class of omnibuses.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE MILITIA.—A public meeting of the members and friends of the London Peace Society took place on Tuesday evening, at Finsbury Chapel, Moorfields, and most resolutions against the enrolment of the militia. The meeting was very numerously attended. The propositions for its formation were agreed to with entire cordiality and unanimity.

METROPOLITAN IMPROVEMENTS.—The quaint red barracks at Kensington have been recently removed, together with the Grapes public-house, to complete the new and magnificent road now forming from Bayswater to the High-street, Kensington. The houses building upon this site, and which overlook Kensington Gardens, are in the first style of architecture. Two mansions are already finished; one of which stands upon a space of an acre and a half of ground. A lodge in the same correct style as that at the north end is to be erected at the Bayswater entrance; and there seems the general feeling that the road, from its great breadth, imposing aspect, and the correct taste displayed throughout, bids fair to become a most aristocratic neighbourhood. It has, likewise, a very beautiful appearance at night, from the large size of the gas lamps, and their close approximation to each other.

HOSPITAL FOR CONSUMPTION.—At a late meeting of the Committee of Management of the above Hospital, it was officially announced that Sir Edward Paget had most kindly acceded to the wishes of the Committee, conveyed to him through his Grace the Duke of Richmond, to allow a Bazaar to be held in the Royal Gardens, Chelsea, in June next, for the Benefit of the building-fund of the new hospital now in the course of erection at Brompton, under the superintendence of F. J. Francis, Esq., the architect; it was moreover stated that her Majesty the Queen had most graciously intimated (through Sir Henry Wheatley) her intention of patronising the undertaking.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

THE REV. ERNLE KYRLE-MONEY

The Rev. Ernle Kyrle-Money, M.A., Vicar of Much Marcle, and Prebendary of Hereford Cathedral, died at Mershaun House, near Southampton, on the 17th inst. The reverend gentleman, who was brother of the late Major-General Sir James Kyrle Money, Bart., of Hom House, and fourth son of William Money, Esq., of Much Marcle, by Mary his wife, daughter of William Webster, Esq., of Stockton on Tees, lineally derived through the Washbournes and Ernles from the ancient Herefordshire family of Kyrle, of which was John Kyrle, "the Man of Ross." We may in passing remark that the character of that amiable man was faithfully delineated by Pope, and many a tradition of the country still bears ample testimony to the truth of the poet's beautiful encomium. Col. James Money, the grandfather of the reverend gentleman whose decease we record, served in the 39th Foot, and was present in the Man of Ross; and thus the reproach—is deservedly done away.

And what! no monument, inscription, stone!

Mr. Ernle Kyrle-Money, married Jan. 16th, 1806, Mary Thomasina, daughter of Dominick French, Esq., and has left several children.

DR. ALEXANDER JOHN HANNAY.

This distinguished ornament of the medical profession died a few days since at Glasgow. The melancholy event has caused the deepest regret, and the void his departure has left in the learned circle in which he moved, will be long and painfully felt. Dr. Hannay, a native of Wigtonshire, received his education chiefly at Edinburgh, but perfected his studies in Paris, at a period when the signal improvements of Laennec and the other eminent men of his time had effected so many important changes in the science of medicine. On his return to Scotland, he established himself at Glasgow, and there, by means of his lectures and practice, diffused the enlightened views and the extended knowledge he had acquired—with what success can be estimated by the fact that the late celebrated physician, Dr. Hope, of London, dedicated to Dr. Hannay the latest edition of his great work on "The Diseases of the Heart."

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—Our market still continues in a very dull state for all articles of grain. Since Monday's arrivals of English wheat have been very limited, yet the demand for it to-day was excessively heavy, at almost nominal figures. Free foreign wheat was held at full currencies, yet it was only those in actual want who were disposed to do any business, most of the buyers being disposed to wait the result of Monday's supply. There was a fair supply of fresh Scotch and Suffolk barley on show. For all kinds the sale was dull, at a reduction in prices of 1s per quarter. The malt trade was dull, and the rates had a downward tendency. Oats, beans, peas, and flour were heavy, at barely late rates Bengal and foreign sugars command very full prices. Refined goods steady, at 63s to 63s for brown, and 64s for standard lumps.

Coffee.—Ordinary Ceylon is in fair request, at 49s to 49s 6d. Other kinds of coffee, though they cannot be considered cheaper, are a slow sale

Rice.—Bengal has fallen 3d to 6d per cwt. Cleaned rice very dull

Pimento.—The quantity offering is limited, and prices are firm. Of 2811 chests put up 4500 were sold, 2358 withdrawn, and 1053 bought in. Compared with the preceding sales the prices show a decline of from 2d to 3d

ROBT. HERBERT.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The continued depression, and, in fact, daily increasing difficulty of procuring commercial accommodation, from the drain consequent upon paying the railway deposits into the Bank of England, has already caused several failures, and more are confidently anticipated. On Wednesday the Directors of the Bank of England again modified their practice of granting loans, substituting only 14 days instead of 21 days, which was the limit permitted on last week. Five per cent continues to be the minimum for accommodation, and only first class paper at short dates, will be accepted at that price. To the two budding companies alluded to in the Monetary News of last week, the Sheffield and Retford Bank and a large discount firm in London, must now be added. The final period, however, for making the deposits is now fast approaching, and sanguine hopes are entertained that after that date the weight from the Money Market will be removed. Consols at the beginning of the week displayed some steadiness, and, in fact, continue at a much higher price than the state of affairs generally could lead to the anticipation of. The principal cause, however, is a probable scarcity of Stock, in the event of any large investments on account of railway deposits, joined to the daily purchases of the Government Broker, which, of course, tends to reduce the floating amount of money afloat. Consols, on Monday, quoted 94¼ to ⅝ for Money, and 94⅝ to ⅝ for Account. Prices have since fluctuated for ⅛ to ¼ per cent, and much unsteadiness is the prevailing feature of the market. The American Stocks, although considerably depressed at last week's prices, did not materially affect transactions, which at the close stood at 94⅛ to ¼ for Money, and 94⅜ to ½ for Time. The Exchequer Market has improved upon some large purchases, and closes at 26 to 28 Those wide quotations are, however, symptoms of unsatisfactoriness not to be disregarded. Bank Stock is 206; Reduced, 95½; New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents, 97⅛; India Bonds, 82

There has been no feature worthy of record in the Foreign House, except a tendency to decline in Spanish Stock. The opening price on Monday was 29¾ to 29⅝ for the Five per Cents., and, after some trifling fluctuations, close at 27⅞. The Three per Cents. have receded from 20¾ to 20. Mexican, on the contrary, improved from 30 to 30⅛. A large sale of Dutch on Wednesday caused a heaviness in prices and the closing quotation is 59⅞ for the Two-and-a-Half per Cents.; Four per Cents., 94⅜. Peruvian is 39¾; Brazilian, 81¼; and Buenos Ayres, 40⅝

Sir Robert Peel's appointment of a Committee to report upon the best principle for railway legislation during the ensuing session, has had the effect of depressing all descriptions of Scrip. At the same time it imposes a serious responsibility on Directors with regard to making the deposits, or awaiting the result of the Committee's report. If, on the one hand, the deposit is made, and the line be not recommended, time must elapse before the money is repaid; and then comes the question, whether to return it to the shareholders, less the expenses, or to hand it over to the new line. On the other hand, if the deposit be not made, postponement is inevitable, and the same question arises as to the disposal of the funds, with this advantage, that an immediate distribution could be made, if so desired. Registered shares are not entirely free from these depressing influences, as extensions are projected from nearly all the lines in operation. Fortunately, the transactions in the Share Market have been limited during the week, and it cannot eventually pass off tolerably quietly. But great depressions exist, and sales on limit of even the best lines are being quietly made. The closing prices subjoined will show the little business done in the principal lines of the market:—Ambergate, Nottingham, Boston, and Eastern Junction, 2¾; Birmingham and Oxford Junction, 2¾; Bristol and Exeter, 84; Buckinghamshire, ¾ pm.; Caledonian, 14½; Ditto New, 4; Ditto Extension, 2½; Cambridge and Lincoln, 2½; Catebyhead, 2½; Chester and West Manchester (Remington's), 1⅜; Direct Northern, 2½; Dublin and Galway, 2⅝; Eastern Counties, 2¼; Ditto New, 7⅛ pm.; Ditto Perpet. 8 per Cent., ¾ pm.; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 1; East Lincolnshire, 3; Yeovil, and Dorchester, 2½; Goole, Doncaster, and Sheffield, &c., 1⅜ pm.; Grand Union (Nottingham and Lynn), 1⅛; Great Grimsby, Louth, Horncastle, &c., ⅜ dis.; Great North of England, 2½; Great Western Quarter Shares, 26⅜; Ditto, Half Shares, 26⅜; Hull and Selby, 27; Ditto Fifths 22¾; London and Blackwall, 8½; London and Brighton, 67½; London and Croydon, 22¾; London and South Western, 28¾; Ditto, New Consol. INTERIOR OF SEACROFT CHURCH, NEAR LEEDS.

SEACROFT CHURCH.

This excellent specimen of the early English style has lately been completed at Seacroft, near Leeds, from the design of Mr. Hellyer, of Ryde, Isle of Wight. The contract was taken by Mr. Benjamin Russell, of Leeds, at £1915.

The church consists, in plan, of a nave, north aisle, and transept, with a very bold chancel. At the west end of the aisle rises a tower and spire, 94 feet in height; and the principal entrance is by a well-proportioned porch. The view of the exterior from the north-east and north-west, is exceedingly picturesque; and the finely designed pile forms a striking feature on the road to York and Tadcaster.

Our Illustration will convey a correct idea of the architectural treatment of the interior, which is especially successful in the chancel; windows wherein are filled with stained glass, with figures and emblems, the offerings of private individuals. The roof is open, and rich in chromatic decoration; and the walls bear labels with inscriptions. The seats are open, and will accommodate 400 persons, the whole of which, except about 20, are free. The ornamented font is shown to the right of our Engraving.

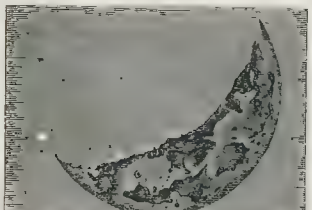
The following are the main dimensions of the edifice: nave, 74 ft. by 24 feet; north aisle, 27 ft. by 11 ft.; transept, 19 ft. 6 in. by 15 ft.; chancel, 26 ft. by 16 ft.; tower, 8 ft. 9 in. square.

This church has been built by subscription, assisted by grants from the Incorporated Society for Building Churches and Chapels; and by the Ripon Diocesan Society. Among those who have contributed to the good work are the family of Mr. Wilson, of Seacroft Hall; and the Rev. A. Martineau, vicar of Whitkirk, in which parish Seacroft is situate. The above is, therefore, a district church: the incumbent is the Rev. H. Blanchard.

We are happy to learn that the new church has given universal satisfaction to the district; and on the day of consecration it elicited a high compliment from the Bishop of Ripon.

ASTRONOMICAL PHENOMENON, TO-MORROW (SUNDAY) EVENING.

We quote the following from the "Illustrated London Almanack" for the present year —



ASTRONOMICAL PHENOMENON.

"On February 1, during the evening, the Moon, Jupiter and Mars are near to each other. At 10h. 3m., the Moon will occult Mars, or Mars will become hidden by the Moon, and remain thus hidden for twenty minutes, till 10h. 23m., at which time he will re-appear at the lowest part of the Moon. The phenomenon is represented in the accompanying drawing. The Planet will disappear on the left hand side of the Moon, and a little above its enlightened part.

"At the time of the phenomenon, the Moon will be due West. The planet Mars during this month will be near to Jupiter, appearing W. of him till the 15th and 16th days, at which time he will be immediately above Jupiter; and he continues above him by quantities becoming greater and greater, day by day. After the 16th day, he will be E. of Jupiter, and will be more and more separated from him day by day."

WILL OF THE LATE EARL GRANVILLE, G.C.B., P.C.—The will of the late Right Hon. Granville, Earl Granville, Baron Leveson, was proved in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, on Friday, the 23rd inst., by the Right Hon. Granville George, Earl Granville, the eldest son and sole executor. The personal estate was sworn under £160,000. For his wife, the Countess, a provision is made by the will and marriage settlement to secure for her life £9000 per annum, a legacy of £1000 for immediate requirements, and the selection of such carriages, horses, furniture, books, pictures, and household effects as she may be pleased to have for her absolute use. £6000 is also appointed by the settlement to each of his two daughters, and £12,000 to his younger son, the Hon. Edward Frederick Leveson Gower, and a legacy of £6000 at the death of his mother the Countess; also certain undivided shares in the Lilleshall Company. All his other shares and interest and property in the said Company he leaves under the same trusts and conditions as his real estates—subject to certain payments and charges—the tenant in tail in possession to act as the proprietor, and as if he was the sole absolute owner. His real estate is devised to the present Earl and his issue male; in failure to his younger son, Edward Frederick Leveson Gower and his issue male; on failure of male issue, to their daughters; and on failure, to right heirs. There are but few legacies. £800 is left to Mr. G. A. Stewart, and the like sum to his sister, Mrs. Hannah Osborne; and legacies to his servants. The present Earl is appointed residuary legatee. The will is dated October 15, 1841, and three codicils were added last year.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

THE ORD BRIDGE, LANCASTER.

The last arch of the ancient Bridge crossing the Loyne, or Lune, at Lancaster, fell on the morning of the 28th of December last. This was the first Bridge built in Lancaster, and is supposed to have been constructed by the Danes; though, the town itself is of much higher antiquity. It is inferred, from the Roman antiquities discovered here, to have been a Station: Camden will have it to be the Longovicum of the Notitia; and others, the Ad Alanum of Richard of Cirencester. It is stated to have been dismantled by the Picts, after the departure of the Romans, but restored by the Anglo-Saxons of Northumbria, under whom it first gave name to the Shire.

THE ORD BRIDGE, LANCASTER.

The above Bridge was purchased from the County in 1802, by Mr. Brockbank, a ship builder, whose premises it adjoined; and, there being another Bridge erected above the old one, across the Lune, Mr. Brockbank removed one of the arches of the ancient Bridge, (as shown in our Engraving), for the convenience of taking large vessels through, it being difficult to get them under the Bridge. But for this removal of one arch, it is believed that the Bridge would have served as a public roadway for ages; and thus has "time-honoured Lancaster" lost one of its antiquarian attractions, though still to be cherished in our columns. The Illustration shows the Bridge as it appeared some 40 years since.

ODE, BY THE MAYOR OF CANTON.

We have received from a Correspondent a copy of an Ode, composed on board H.M.S. Vixen, by Lew-tsin, Lord Mayor of Canton, together with a sketch of the civic composer.

AN ODE,

COMPOSED BY LEW-TSIN, LORD MAYOR OF CANTON, DOCTOR OF THE IMPERIAL COLLEGE, ON BOARD OF H. M. STEAMER "VIXEN," ON HIS PASSAGE TO CANTON, AFTER A VISIT TO HONG-KONG, NOVEMBER 25, 1845.

(Translated from the original, by Charles Gutzlaff, Esq.)

Whilst the white hoary frost drop down on the fragrant but leafless trees of the forest, and sombre vapours arise between enchanted hills and defiles; whilst the foaming wave of the blue deep darts heaven-ward, and the zephyrs dispel earth's gloom; it is then that, seated amongst a grove of marygold flower-bushes, I, with tears, remember in the solitary hack, the days now past, as if I had left my wife [illegible], my heart grows still, my robe flutters; I am as a man pierced by a dagger; I look upon yonder Royal White City,* on the high cliffs, whilst the shades of evening are falling; there it stands, lonely like Kivei.† Soon the glorious orb disappears, but I am still lingering, directing my views towards the south stars, as if I beheld gorgeous flowers; but the harbinger of light departs, and now I weep with bitterness, whilst floating on the ark, as if mindful of bygone times; and as I sink on my pillow, there stands still before me the splendid town, the fragrant incense urn with its abode on the mountains,‡ with its painted walls, which I have just left; silently wailing in the sorrow of my soul, I am induced once more to recall the tendrils§ that twine themselves round these cliffs. Suddenly, the bright moon breaks through the clouds, and now behold the bamboo and jessamine on the isles: thousands of habitations have sprung up on the vast heights, and soon the silent morning sun sheds lustre upon innumerable spacious mansions, so magnificent and grand; yet on this spot, where once only the hovels of the roving fisherman, who has now departed as swallows in autumn. Thus I recorded my uncontrollable regret in the above lines, when leaving your empire, on returning from Hong-Kong on board a marine vessel in the tenth month of the yeh-see year.

THE POET MAYOR OF CANTON.

Like Hong-Kong, my renown is small; like Lew-Heang I have taught the classics, but acted contrary to their doctrines. I am a youth of slender attainments, and similar to a hungry horse that possesses no real substance.

(Signed) Your old friend of the Diamond Hall wrote this.

LORD BROUGHAM IN DANGER.—On Tuesday (last week), as the steamer was leaving Boulogne for Folkestone in a gale, having on board Lord Brougham as a passenger, she ducked into a heavy sea, damaged the cabouse, and filled her forecastle with water. Fortunately nothing serious was the result.

THE MILITIA.—The following are the qualifications for holding commissions in the militia:—For colonel, £1000 a-year landed property, or to be heir apparent to £3000 a-year. For lieutenant-colonel, £6000 a-year landed property, or to be heir apparent to £1200 a-year. For major, £400 a-year landed property, or to be heir apparent to £800 a-year. IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF COMMONS TUESDAY.

HE circumstance of Tuesday being appointed by Sir Robert Peel for making his commercial and financial statement, led to much excitement in the neighbourhood of the House From the hour of one in the afternoon, strangers who had had the good fortune to procure tickets of admission to the galleries were to be seen making their way with much haste to the scene of the all-important announcement—respecting the fate of the Corn-laws; and, by half an hour after the time mentioned there were more candidates for admission to the Strangers' Galleries than the whole House itself could conveniently hold.

Every passage leading to the interior of the House was crowded to excess, so that the police (who attended in considerable numbers) had no little difficulty in keeping a passage clear for the members. The doors were opened a little before the usual hour, immediately after which every seat was thronged to such an extent as not to leave a single one unoccupied, to the great disappointment and mortification of some hundreds who, having tickets, calculated upon admission as a certainty.

In the street from the end of Parliament-street to the south end of Westminster Abbey—the footways on both sides were densely thronged with, for the greater part, well-dressed persons, who contented themselves with inquiring of their neighbours the names of many members as they passed, or pointing out to others those whom they themselves happened to know

Many hon. members who are opposed to the Corn-laws as they now stand were cheered as they passed, and amongst these none received louder or more hearty cheers than the Duke of Wellington

The attendance of members in the house was very numerous. There were not less than 400 present at half-past four. The seats below the bar, usually reserved for strangers, were filled with Peers and other distinguished visitors

Lord John Russell entered the House about half-past four, and remained standing for some time at the bar, conversing freely with some young member. Sir Robert Peel entered about ten minutes later, with somewhat less of his usual insouciance bonté, and (very unusually for him) stopped on the way to his seat, and shook hands cordially with Lord Ashley. Soon afterwards his Royal Highness Prince Albert entered the house, dressed as a private gentleman, attracted there, no doubt, by the importance of the debate, and probably desirous to see how a great orator and statesman would acquit himself on this great occasion. His Royal Highness was accompanied by the Earl of Jersey, and took a seat below the serjeant's chair, but we believe within the bar, and one of those usually occupied by members. His Royal Highness was soon joined by the Duke of Cambridge, on whose arrival cordial greetings were exchanged between the Royal relatives. The seats below the bar were thronged chiefly with members of the Upper House, including several of the Bishops. Above them also we could discover, glancing through the pigeon holes, several ladies.

The preliminary business was confined to the presentation of Petitions.

REPEAL OF THE CORN-LAWS AND RELAXATION OF COMMERCIAL RESTRICTIONS.

SIR R. PEEL moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House, on customs and corn importation, and that so much of her Majesty's most gracious Speech as related thereto be referred to the same Committee.

On the question that the Speaker do leave the chair,

Mr. W. MILES said he wished to ask a question, which he was quite certain would be answered by the right hon. Baronet with his usual courtesy. It was simply this—the right hon. Baronet was about to make a financial explanation, and he (Mr. Miles) wished to know whether he intended to take any vote to-night? From what the right hon. Baronet had previously stated, and from the remarks made by other members of her Majesty's Government, the statement would, no doubt, be rather a complicated one, and he (Mr. Miles) hoped that, previously to coming to any decision, ample time would be given to the country to consider all the measures (hear, hear), and decide upon them affirmatively or negatively, by the means which the Constitution afforded them. Ample time, he trusted, would be given to the counties to express their opinions. (Laughter from the Opposition.)

SIR R. PEEL was quite ready to give the hon. gentleman any explanation in his power. The statement which he was about to make would be very extensive, and, in some respects, complicated. It would be rather a commercial than a financial statement. It was not his intention to ask the House of Commons to pronounce an opinion upon any part of the statement which he was about to make. It was his most earnest wish that the matter should be fully and sufficiently considered that it should be judged of as a whole, as a comprehensive settlement of a great question. (Hear, hear.) He, therefore, did not propose to ask any opinion whatever of the House, either upon the general propriety of the plan, or any of its details, until after the lapse of some days (Hear, hear.)

The House then resolved itself into Committee, Mr. Greene in the chair. The portion of her Majesty's Speech relative to commerce and protective duties having been read,

SIR R. PEEL rose about twelve minutes before five, and said Mr. Greene, whatever opinion may be ultimately formed with regard to the merits of the proposal which I am about, on the part of her Majesty's Government, to submit this night to the consideration of the House, I am confident that the extreme difficulty of the task which it devolves upon me to perform, and the great magnitude of the interests which are concerned in the proposal I am about to make, will ensure to me that patient and indulgent attention, without which it would be wholly out of my power, either with satisfaction to myself or to the public interests, to discharge the duty I have undertaken to perform. Sir, in pursuance of the recommendations of her Majesty's Speech from the throne, advised by her responsible servants, I am about to review the duties which apply to many articles, the produce and manufactures of other countries. I am about to proceed on the assumption adopted in the Speech from the throne, that the repeal of prohibitory and the relaxation of protective duties is in itself a wise policy—(cheers) that protective duties abstractedly and on principle, are open to objection—(cheers) that the policy of maintaining them may be defended, but that there must be shown to be special considerations either of public advantage or of justice to vindicate the maintenance of them. (Cheers.) I am about to act on this presumption: that during the period of the last three years there has been in this country an increased productiveness of revenue, notwithstanding the relaxation of heavy taxation—(cheers)—that there has been an increased demand for labour; that there has been increased commerce; that there has been increased comfort, contentment, and peace in this country (Cheers.) I do not say that these great blessings have necessarily been caused by any particular policy which you have adopted; but this I say, that the enjoyment of these inestimable benefits has been at least concurrent with your policy that policy which has been sanctioned by the House of Commons—the policy of repealing prohibitory, and reducing protective duties. I am not now, therefore, by pursuing that policy, about to call upon the House of Commons to recede from any course which it has hitherto pursued. It is a policy which has received its deliberate and repeated sanction, and if it has been productive of public good, it will be perfectly consistent with the course hitherto pursued to persevere in that policy. At the same time, in advising the continued application of these principles, I am not about to disregard the other recommendation in her Majesty's Speech, namely—that in the adoption of principles, however sound, we should not be unmindful of the public credit, and that we should take care not to cause any permanent loss in the public revenue (Cheers.) That other recommendation also, that in the application of sound principles we should act with so much of caution and forbearance as not injuriously to affect any of the great interests of the country, will not be neglected by me Above all, I trust that that recommendation of her Majesty the confidence, rather, expressed by her Majesty—that this great subject will receive the just and dispassionate consideration of the House of Commons, will be justified by the result. I have already stated, in answer to the question put to me by the hon. member for Somersetshire (Mr. Miles), that I do not contemplate asking of the House of Commons to pronounce to-night any opinion upon the whole or any part of the proposal I am about to make. It is the wish of her Majesty's Government that that proposal should be deliberately and dispassionately considered. It may be possible, as I am about to affect so many interests, that all may unite in the conclusion that this is a rash and improvident scheme, and ought at once to be discouraged and extinguished. If that be the prevailing impression on the part of those who are called on to relinquish the supposed benefit of protection, nothing will be more easy than on that night on which we approach the serious consideration of this question to invite the House to put on record their approbation of some principle counter to that on which we are about to act (cheers); to resolve, for instance, "that protection to domestic industry is in itself a good," and that that principle ought to be sanctioned by the House. (Cheers.) On the other hand, the conclusion drawn by this House and by the country may be that, considering all the great difficulties of this question considering the variety of opinions, considering the nature of the contest which has long been sustained, and which, I fear, will long continue, unless there be a satisfactory and early adjustment of this question (cheers); it may be that even those who may dissent from particular portions of the measure I am about to submit may be disposed to accept it as a whole, and the voice of the country may pronounce an opinion, that the plan I propose is not an inequitable or unwise adjustment, and, rather than continue perpetual conflict, ought to be accepted. If that be the conclusion to which the general opinion of the reasonable and intelligent of all classes shall tend, in that case I shall have confidence of ultimate success. On the other hand, if so many interests are affected by the application of the great principle that protective duties are not in themselves abstractedly good, and ought to be relinquished, and if those interests should combine in opposition to my proposal, the sooner it is disposed of the better it will be for the public interests. The principle to which I have referred, namely, the relaxation of protective duties, I am not about to apply to any one particular interest. (Cheers.) I am not about to select that great interest connected with the agriculture of this country, and call on them to resign protection, unprepared at the same time to call on other protected interests to make the same sacrifice. (Cheers.) I make no separate and isolated proposals. I have confidence that the proposal for which I contend is just, when I ask all protectionists to make the sacrifice, if it be a sacrifice, which the application of the principle requires of them. (Cheers) Sir, the House is aware that, during the last three years, what is called the tariff, i.e., the whole scheme of Customs' duties, has been submitted to the review and consideration of Parliament. In 1842, it was my duty, as the organ of the Government, to propose a great change in the then existing Customs duties. The general principle of the plan upon which we then acted was to remit the duties upon articles of raw material constituting the elements of manufacturing industry The principle of it also was to subject manufactured articles, the effect of the labour of other countries, to duties not exceeding 20 per cent. Not only in 1842, but at subsequent periods, the House adopted the principle upon which it acted in 1842. Notwithstanding the apprehension of falling revenue, we did select great articles, being raw materials, for the remission of taxation. In 1844, we reduced altogether the duty upon wool; in 1845, we reduced altogether the duty upon cotton. There hardly remains a raw material imported from other countries upon which the duty has not been reduced. The manufacturers of this country, therefore, have at present an advantage which they have not heretofore enjoyed they have free access to the raw materials which constitute immediately the fabrics of their manufactures. I am entitled, therefore, I think, to call upon the manufacturer to relax the protection which he enjoys. (Cheers.) He has an advantage which he has not hitherto possessed. I think there might have been great doubt whether or no you might not have continued to derive the revenue you have hitherto derived from the import of cotton wool, even if the duty which existed in 1844 had continued. But the House was sensible that with the continuance of that tax there was a formidable competition; and the House disregarded the consideration of some £600,000 or £700,000 of revenue they wished to establish the prosperity of the great staple manufacture of this country, the cotton manufacture, on some sure and certain foundation; they willingly, therefore, consented to forego an amount of duty so easily levied, and causing so little of complaint from the great body of the people, without, perhaps, minute inquiry into its immediate effect; and both with regard to sheep's wool and cotton wool, this House has subjected itself to the impost of an income tax, and out of consideration for the permanent prosperity of manufactures, remitted the duties attached to the raw material. (Cheers.)

Sir, I propose, in taking the review of duties still existing, to which we are invited by her Majesty, to continue to act upon the principle which this House has sanctioned; and I take in the first instance those articles of raw materials which still remain subject to duty. I mean to deal with them in order, still further to enable me to call on the manufacturer to relax the protection he still enjoys (Cheers.)

Sir, there is hardly any other article of the nature of a raw material which is now subject to duty except tallow, and perhaps I ought to add timber. With respect to tallow, which is of the nature of raw material which is largely used in many manufactures—manufactures of great importance to the comfort of the great body of the people, I mean soap, candles, &c, I propose a reduction in the amount of duty which is levied on that article. Russia is the country from which chiefly our imports of tallow are derived. There is at present a duty on tallow to the amount of 3s. 2d. per cwt. The subject was adverted to in the course of the discussions on the last tariff; and mainly with a view to our own interests, but partly for the purpose of encouraging Russia to proceed in that liberal policy of which I trust she has given some indication. I propose, without stipulation (cheers) that England should set the example (cheers) by that relaxation of those heavy duties, in the confidence that that example will ultimately prevail (cheers); that the interests of the great body of consumers will soon influence the action of Governments, and that our example, even if we don't purchase any immediate reciprocal benefit, yet, whilst by a reduction like that we shall, in the first instance, improve our own manufacture, I believe we shall soon reap the other advantage of deriving some equivalent in our commercial intercourse. (Cheers.) I propose, therefore, to reduce the duty on tallow from 3s 2d. per cwt. to 1s. 6d (Hear, hear.) I am taking the articles which are of the nature of raw materials.

Now, with respect to timber: I don't mean to except the duties on timber from the review I am about to undertake. (Hear, hear.) We have admitted timber the produce of our colonial possessions, to be imported at a nominal duty; I am about to affect domestic interests by the relaxation of protective duties, and we have a perfect right, I think, if they be protected, to affect colonial interests. (Hear, hear.) The question of timber is a very difficult one. I am prepared to make a definite proposal with respect to every other article. I know the advantage of early communication that communication shall take place, but I am most anxious, in effecting reductions of the duty on timber, to insure to the consumer the benefit of the whole change. (Cheers.) The course which Government will probably take will be a gradual reduction of the existing amount of duty, where it shall rest a certain time, lower than at present, the reduction being so apportioned, if possible, as to prevent any derangement of internal trade by inducing parties to withhold the supply of timber in the hope of realising a large amount of duty, and yet at the same time, as the importation of timber from the Baltic partakes in some respect, from the nature of the article, of a monopoly, to take care the reduction of duty should be an advantage not so much to the producer but to the consumer. In a day or two after the opportunity of a more minute consideration of details, the intention of the Government with regard to timber shall be made known. The subject, I have said, is a very complicated one, and it is very difficult to get the requisite information, as it is absolutely necessary to keep your intentions a perfect secret before you announce your plan. I trust, however, the House will be satisfied with my general expression of our intention to make a gradual reduction of the duty on timber spread over a certain number of years; but three or four days must elapse before we can more specifically announce our plan. These are reductions only; they are not the repeal of duties on articles of the nature of raw materials. With these exceptions, I hardly know a raw material in respect of which there is any duty.

Having now taken that course, having given the manufacturer the advantage of a free command, without any impost, of the raw materials which enter into his fabrics, I call upon the manufacturers of the three great articles which enter into consumption as the clothing of the great body of the community, to give that proof which I am sure they will give of the sincerity of their conviction as to the impolicy of protective duties, by consenting to relax the protection on their manufactures. (Loud cheers from the Opposition benches.) The three great branches of manufacture of which I speak are those which are immediately concerned with the clothing of the great body of the people I speak of the linen, the woollen, and the cotton manufactures. (Cheers.) I ask them at once to set the example to others by relaxing voluntarily and cheerfully the protection they enjoy. (Cheers.) Sir, an hon. friend of mine, the member for Dorsetshire and I assure him I shall still call him my hon. friend, for it shall not be my fault if any unfortunate differences on political subjects interfere with private friendships (cheers); without any of the reserves and restraints which appear to embarrass him, I therefore at once call him by that appellation by which I have always addressed him (cheers)—my hon. friend expressed a hope, being jealous of the expressions in the Speech, that the small interests of the country would not be forgotten. He said, "Her Majesty is solicitous that the great interests of the country should not be injuriously affected; but nothing is said of the smaller interests." Now, I do not mean in this review of the Tariff to subject myself to the imputation to which I was subjected before. I mean to affect great interests, and, if possible, to treat with forbearance and consideration the smaller interests. I shall, therefore, fulfil my hon friend's views, and gratify his expectations, by assuring him that he will have no cause to complain, that while the great interests are affected, the smaller interests are neglected. For instance, in dealing with the clothing of the great body of the people, I shall call on the manufacturers of the great articles of cotton, woollen, and linen, to relinquish that protection which they at present enjoy; but with regard to those articles which are made up, and which, consequently, employ the labour of the industrious classes of this country, I shall propose to treat them with more forbearance, and to continue some protective duty As the case now stands, the great articles of the cotton manufacture, such as calicoes, prints, &c., are subject to a duty of 10 per cent. on importation, while cottons made up, such for instance as cotton stockings, &c., when brought from abroad, are subject to a duty of 20 per cent. With respect to cotton manufactures generally, which is now subject to a duty of 10 per cent., I propose that it should be imported duty free (loud cries of "Hear"), and that duty of 20 per cent, which now applies to the manufactured articles of cotton in a more advanced state, I propose to reduce to 10 per cent. (Hear.) That is to say, that on the great articles of cotton manufacture, which constitute the articles of clothing for the great mass of the people, there will be no import duty, while the import duty on cotton articles in a more advanced state of manufacture will be 10 per cent. (A cry of "Take it all off," and some slight interruption.) The only favour I ask is, that I may be permitted to state the whole of the plan (cheers), without any inferences being drawn at once as to any particular parts. (Hear, hear.) I may have to make qualifications—to adopt precautions, and the first part of my [illegible] may give rise to erroneous conclusions, unless the judgment is suspended until the whole is explained. (Hear, hear.) All I ask, therefore, is, not even that you should suspend your judgment to a future day, but that at any rate you should wait until I conclude my observations. (Cheers.) I am the more anxious to call on the manufacturers to set this example of relinquishing protective duties, because, according to a very high authority, it was not the agriculturists, but it was the manufacturers who called on the Legislature, in the first instance, for protective duties. (Hear, hear.) It was the mercantile and manufacturing interest which set the example of requiring protection, and it is, therefore, but justice that they should set the example, as I doubt not they cheerfully will, of relinquishing that protection. (Cheers.) Nothing can be more remarkable than the observation made by one who had no prejudices in favour of the agriculturists. Dr. Adam Smith, speaking historically, says: "Country gentlemen and farmers are, to their great honour, of all people, the least subject to the wretched spirit of monopoly. (Renewed laughter.) Dispersed in different parts of the country, they cannot so easily combine as merchants and manufacturers, who, being collected in towns, and accustomed to that exclusive corporation spirit which prevails in them, naturally endeavour to obtain against all their countrymen the same exclusive privilege which they generally possess against the inhabitants of their respective towns. They accordingly seem to have been the original inventors of those restraints upon the importation of foreign goods which secure to them the monopoly of the home market. It was probably in imitation of them, and to put themselves on a level with those who they found were disposed to oppress them, that the country gentlemen and farmers of Great Britain so far forgot the generosity which is natural to their station, as to demand the exclusive privilege of supplying their countrymen with corn and butcher's meat. They did not, perhaps, take time to consider how much less their interest could be affected by the freedom of trade than that of the people whose example they followed." This extract may excite the laughter of some gentlemen on the other side of the House; but I believe the statement to be perfectly correct, that the restriction did not originate with the agriculturists, but that it was pressed on the Legislature in the first instance by the mercantile and manufacturing interests; and that it was afterwards adopted and extended, as a necessary consequence, by the agricultural interest. I may therefore invite, in the first instance, the manufacturing interest to relinquish protective duties. (Hear, hear.) I propose, also, to call on the manufacturers of linen and woollen, the two other great articles in addition to cotton concerned in the production of the clothing of the great body of the people, to relinquish, as I believe they can without any injurious consequences, protection in their respective articles of their manufacture. (Hear, hear.) There would be a great benefit, I believe, in that the importation of some articles, competing with the production of our manufacturers, will stimulate their skill; and, with the capital and enterprise of this country, I do not doubt but that they will beat foreign manufacture. At present, woollen goods which are made up are subject, under the reduced tariff of 1842, to a duty of 20 per cent.; and I propose that, as in the case of made-up cotton goods, the duty should be reduced from 20 per cent. to 10 per cent. In the cotton and woollen trade we have given to the manufacturers the unrestricted power of importing the raw material. The same may be said with regard to the linen manufactures. Flax is free from any duty. I had occasion to say the other night that there is no duty whatever on the import of foreign flax. I propose that in the case of linen, as in the case of cotton and woollen, the coarser articles of manufacture those which are used by the great body of the people should be permitted to come into the country duty free. With respect to the made-up articles of linen, there are some very fine, some not of general consumption, but partaking of the character of luxuries, such as cambries, &c., and other articles used by the rich, but I do not propose, even with respect to them, to maintain the present amount of duty, but to place them all on a level. I propose that the amount of the duty now levied on made-up linens should be reduced to one-half.

There is another article which does not fall within these principles, but with respect to which I think it of great importance, not that we should adopt the same principle, but yet apply to it a great reduction of duty I allude to silks. The existing duty on silks apparently operates as a protection to the domestic manufacture. You have a duty, which is called one of 30 per cent., but which with respect to many articles is a great deal higher; and a false reliance is placed on such a protection. It is no such thing. There are many houses in Paris and on the coast which will guarantee the delivery of goods in London at one-half of the duty. (Hear, hear.) It is, therefore, a clear loss in the first place, and encouragement to smuggling; but it is a delusion on the part of the labouring classes employed in the silk manufacture, to suppose that they enjoy a protection, of which they are in reality robbed by the smuggler and dishonest consumer. (Hear, hear.) I conceive, by a new arrangement with respect to the silk duties—by a reduction of the amount of the duty levied on silks—we are not interfering with any domestic interests; but we are, I believe, stimulating skill and industry in this country, diminishing the profits of the smuggler, and encouraging lawful and innocent traffic instead of of immoral one. (Hear, hear.) The general impression is, that the duty is only 30 per cent. on silk goods. I hold in my hand a statement of the duties on silk manufactures; and though, in respect to some, the duty may not exceed 30 per cent., and in respect to others it may be less, yet there are many articles in respect to which the duty is much higher. In the case of crape, the duty is not less than from 43 to 50 per cent.; on velvet, from 34 to 50 per cent.; on silk net, from 36 to 78 per cent.; on enamelled bonnets, 140 per cent.; and on turbans or caps, at least as much. Does any man believe that a French turban, or cap, or bonnet, pays that amount of duty? It is no such thing. The article is in common use, but it is introduced by the smuggler (Hear, hear.) I propose a new arrangement with respect to silks, but I must not at present enter into too much detail. Of course, every proposal I make will be in the hands of honourable members to-morrow morning. With respect to silks, I propose to adopt a new principle. The general rule will be, enumerating each article of silk manufacture, to levy a duty of so much per pound, giving an option to the Custom-house officers of levying for every £100 value of silk a duty of 15 per cent. This will be the adoption of a principle of 15 per cent. with respect to silks, instead of the present variable and capricious duty, which is called one of 30 per cent., but which is less in some instances, and vastly more in others.

There is another article of manufacture which enters or may enter into competition with the manufacture of this country, and on which the duty, I think, is extravagant. I think the qualified admission of the foreign article will do no injury to our manufacture, but, on the contrary, is likely to stimulate the exercise of skill in its improvement. After the remission which has been made, I think, that the manufacturer will admit that he ought to retain the present enormous amount of import duty. I speak of paper—paper-hangings. The duty on French paper-hangings brought into this country is 1s. the square yard, applied indiscriminately; but it is possible to sell some descriptions of this article at one farthing per square yard. With respect to paper-hangings not worth more than one farthing the square yard, such a duty appears exorbitant, and I propose to reduce it from 1s. to 2d. the square yard.

I approach now those manufactures which are connected with metals. (A slight laugh.) I do not know what excites the risibility of some hon. members, but, however it may offend some, it is my duty to explain these matters. (Hear, hear.) With respect to metals, we have reduced the duty on foreign ores, and if there be any manufacture which can or ought to compete with the foreigner, it is the manufacture of metals in this country. (Hear, hear.) The manufactures of metal, speaking generally, are now all charged with a duty of 15 per cent ad valorem. I propose, with respect to them and all other articles which I do not specifically mention, that the general rule shall be that no duty should exceed 10 per cent.; that should be the maximum. It is impossible to adopt this principle with respect to some articles—paper-hangings, &c., and I mention those which I except from the rule of paying 10 per cent. ad valorem. But with regard to great articles of manufactures, which are subject to a duty of 20 per cent. according to the tariff of 1842, I propose that a duty of 10 per cent. should be the maximum, and this duty will fall on manufactures, such as brocade, earthenware, and other articles of that kind, and on all manufactures of hair. At present there is a duty of 20 per cent. on the import of foreign carriages. ("Hear, hear," and laughter on the Opposition benches.) It consider the whole of these to be a series of equivalents. I am giving advantages to the consumer of this country by reduction of duty; and I will venture to say that there is no article so extravagantly dear as the carriage manufacture. (Ironical cheers.) Without referring to carriages manufactured in Brussels and elsewhere, compare the price of London carriages with those made in Edinburgh and other places. It is most extravagant; and with the command by our manufacturers of timber and metal I can see no reason why foreign carriages imported into this country should be subject to a duty of 20 per cent. I propose to encourage a competition with the manufacturers in this country by permitting the importation of foreign carriages on the payment of a duty of 10 per cent.

There is another manufacture in respect to which I propose a considerable reduction of duty—I propose to reduce the duty on candles. We have reduced the duty on wax and spermaceti, and this night I propose a reduction of the duty now levied on candles to one half. (Hear, hear.)

I propose, also, that the duty on foreign soap should be reduced; that in the case of hard soap, which is now subject to a duty of 30s. per cwt., that duty should, on account of the Excise duty on soap in this country, be reduced to 20s. per cwt.; that in the case of soft soap, the duty should be reduced from 20s. to 14s. per cwt., and that in the case of Naples soap the duty should be reduced from 26s. to 20s. per cwt.

There are many articles on which duty is now levied, and in respect to which I propose to remit the duty altogether. I propose, notwithstanding the great simplification in the tariff of 1842, to carry that simplification still further. There are, I think, not less than nearly 1100 articles remaining in that tariff, because it was thought convenient to have them in an alphabetical arrangement, for the Custom-house officers to see what articles were or were not duty free; but with respect to 500 articles that stand in the tariff there is no duty. Now I propose, with respect to many articles still remaining on the tariff, and subject to duty, that they should be admitted duty free; but I avoid entering into more detail at present with respect to these. There are some manufactures still remaining with which I must deal specially, because, on account of the present amount of duty, or the nature of the article, it might not be advisable to subject them to the general principle. In respect to those articles connected with the manufacture of leather we have made a great reduction of late. We have remitted the duty on raw hides, which are admitted duty free. We have remitted the duty on almost every article connected with the tanning process. There is scarcely one levied. I propose to remit the duty altogether on an article which partakes more of the character of a raw material than a manufacture, namely, dressed hides.

I propose, with a view of reducing the cost of an article of clothing which is important to the working classes of the community—viz., boots and shoes—to take off the duty on dressed hides. There will then not be one raw material which the manufacturer of leather cannot command without the payment of duty. Having done this I propose to diminish the duty on foreign boots and shoes imported into this country. This reduction of duty on this article of clothing is an object of great importance to the comfort of the poor. I propose, therefore, to make the following reductions of duty: On boot-fronts, from 3s. 6d. to 1s. 9d. per dozen pair; large fronts, from 5s. 6d. to 2s. 9d. per dozen pair; boots, from £1 8s. to 14s. per dozen pair; shoes, from 14s. to 7s.; women and children's shoes, in the same proportion. I propose to reduce the duty on hats, and I propose now to carry into effect a reduction which was postponed in 1842, and I am afraid not wisely postponed—I mean with regard to the duty on straw plaiting. I propose to reduce the duty on straw plaiting from 7s 6d. to 3s. per pound, and on straw hats, from 8s. 6d. to 3s. per pound. When I propose the reduction of the duty on silk manufacture, I propose also to take off the duty on what I consider rather a raw than a manufactured article connected with the silk trade. I mean dyed thrown silk.

I think I am convincing the House that I am disposed to act freely and impartially in respect to the application of this principle of the reduction of protective duty. I believe I have exhausted every article which can be called an article of "manufacture," as the word is generally used. I have proposed the reduction of duty upon metals, all articles connected with clothing, and all articles of general use and consumption, and I have stated to the House what is the general principle I propose. (Hear, hear.)

I come now to another article of great importance, which, although a manufacture, yet, in common parlance, does not generally fall within that denomination; it is an article in respect of which I think the time is come for reduction altogether. I propose to reduce the duty upon brandy and foreign spirits. (Hear, hear.) The present duty upon brandy is not less than 22s. 10d. per gallon. That has prevented the increase of importation. At the present moment, I believe, the consumption of French brandy in this country is not greater than it was at the latter end of the seventeenth century, if, indeed, it be so great; and I think that is mainly attributable to the exorbitant amount of the duty, compared with the value of the raw material. Now brandy, like silk, is an article in respect to which the apparent protection is illusory; there is no article, unless it be silk, in respect of which, speaking of our intercourse with the Continent, smuggling so much prevails as it does in the article of foreign spirits. The diminution of duty, therefore, is no necessary diminution of protection to the native producer; it may tend to prevent smuggling, it may tend to convert an unlawful into a lawful traffic, but it is not necessarily the diminution of protection. I propose, then, that the present duty upon foreign brandy and foreign spirits generally, should be reduced from 22s. 10d. to 10s. (Hear, hear.)

There remains one article to which I will advert, in respect to which an arrangement was made only so recently as last year, but which I also intend to propose to the House to include in the reduction of protective duties; I allude to the article of sugar. (Loud cheers from the Opposition benches.) Each of these articles must be made the subject of separate discussion. It is impossible that I should enter into details; I can but submit to the House in outline the intentions of her Majesty's Government. (Hear, hear.) I am very much afraid the proposal I have to make may not at all meet the concurrence and approbation of those hon. members who cheered the mention of sugar; still I will state the proposal which her Majesty's Government have to make. (Hear, hear.) In the last year I estimated the probable amount of increased consumption of sugar in consequence of the reduction of duty at not less, I think, than 50,000 tons. In the remainder of the last year there had been an increase of consumption to the extent of not less than 32,000 tons; whether or no, during the remaining period, which would complete a twelvemonth, there will prove to be so much increase as to bear out my calculation, I cannot undertake to say; still, there cannot be a doubt that there will be a very considerable increase in the consumption of sugar. The amount of free-labour sugar brought into competition with British colonial sugar, however, has not increased. I calculated the amount of free labour sugar at 250,000 tons; the amount actually brought into home consumption has fallen far short of that; I believe the defalcation may be accounted for chiefly by the failure of the crop in Cuba, and an increased consumption on the continent of Europe, with a consequent diversion of supplies which would have been brought to this country from parts of the world in which there is free labour. These will account in great measure for the diminished supply. Still, I am bound to say that I think the British colonial sugar can bear increased competition with sugar the produce of free labour. I am not prepared to make a relaxation with respect to the admission of sugar the produce of countries carrying on the slave-trade; I must still contend for that exclusion; but with respect to sugar, the produce of free labour, her Majesty's Government have not thought it right to exempt sugar from the general application of the principle for which I am contending. We propose, therefore, assuming that the competition is to be with sugar the produce of free labour to deduct 3s. 6d from the amount of the present differential duty. In the case of Mauritius the amount of differential duty is, I think, 9s. 4d.; in the case of clayed sugar I think it is 11s. 8d; we propose to deduct from the amount of differential duty in each case 3s. 6d., leaving the differential duty in favour of British colonial sugar, competing with sugar the produce of free labour, at 5s. 10d. in the one case, and at 8s. in the other. (Hear, hear.)

Now, in concluding this review of all the articles, or at least almost all the articles upon which import duties are levied, I come to those articles which are connected with agriculture. There are many articles of first-rate importance, on which there are very heavy duties, but on which those heavy duties do not operate as protecting duties. I take the article of tobacco. In making the extensive changes which, on the part of her Majesty's Government, I now propose, I do hope that the consideration of the public revenue will be permitted to have its due weight and that, although the arguments may be most cogent in respect to the reduction of the duty on particular articles, yet the House will bear in mind the importance of not breaking down the public revenue. (Hear, hear.) The pressure upon the revenue on account of the reductions which I propose, must be very great; and considerations of the public interest, considerations of national defence, leave us no alternative but to propose an increase in the estimates; we must discuss considerations of revenue where interests of such great importance are concerned; but the House will bear in mind, that I am proposing reductions in the Tariff, which will necessarily cause, for the present, a considerable defalcation of the revenue, and, on the other hand, that, in our opinion, it has become our duty to propose—not from any hostile considerations, but for the purpose of providing for the defences of the country—that increase in the estimates. I hope, then, that those who think there are duties, excessarily high, still retained upon some great articles of consumption, will not press for simultaneous reductions in all. (Hear, hear.) I will first refer to those articles of agricultural produce which are not immediately connected with the food of the people.

I take, in the first instance, the seeds of grasses and other seeds. I have a deep conviction that the reduction of duty upon agricultural seeds, so far from being the removal of protection upon agriculture, is conferring a benefit upon agriculture. (Hear, hear.) I take the article of cloverseed. Now, surely it would be impossible to maintain that the heavy duty which was some years since applied to cloverseed operated as a protection to agricultural produce. In many parts of the country the duty upon cloverseed was, in fact, a heavy burden. In 1843, if I recollect right, you levied a duty upon cloverseed to the amount of not less than £144,000. What a small portion of the agricultural districts of this country was benefited by the levy of that duty! Cloverseed was required in those parts of the country where agriculture is most advanced; cloverseed was required as contributing to the most improved system of agriculture. Some few counties in England were the producers of cloverseed, but, speaking generally, the duty levied upon cloverseed was not a protection, but a burden to agriculture. (Hear, hear.) With respect, then, to all agricultural seeds generally, not for the removal of protection, but as a benefit to agriculture, I propose to reduce the duty, and to apply to all a moderate duty. The duty on cloverseed was reduced one-half in 1842; at a previous period it had reached nearly £150,000 in one year; last year it was £75,000. As I have reduced the great mass of manufactures, generally speaking, to an uniform duty of 10 per cent., so, with respect to all seeds, for the purpose of simplifying the matter, I propose that the duty generally shall not exceed 6s per cwt.: that that shall apply to cloverseed and to all seeds. In the case of leek and onion seed, the duty at present is not less than 20s. I propose with respect to all seeds, that the maximum duty shall be 5s. (Hear, hear.) I have already spoken of that most important department of agriculture, the fattening of cattle. I believe it is impossible to over-estimate the importance of promoting the fattening of cattle, as instrumental to an improved system of agriculture. The restoration of fertility to the soil by means of man ure is one of the most beneficial of the dispensations of Providence; and I believe that there is no manure, bring it from where you will, which, in respect to its fertilising qualities, can enter into competition with that which has been derived from the soil. You cannot conduce more to the improvement of inferior soils than by encouraging the feeding and fattening of cattle, and thus promoting the application of the manure to the increase of the fertility of the land. I propose, therefore, that an article of grain, which I believe to be mainly applied to the fattening of cattle, shall be here admitted duty free: it is an article of immense importance—I mean maize, or Indian corn. (Hear, hear.) I propose that the duty upon maize shall hereafter and immediately be a nominal duty. (Hear, hear.) Now, I do not consider that by removing the duty on maize I am depriving agriculture of any protection. Maize is generally used in the United States, I believe, partly for human food; and I believe that, though it is very much disregarded in this country, on parts of the continent it is made into excellent food, and in parts of the United States it is even preferred to articles of food which we in this country use. I do believe, that the free importation of maize, so far from doing any disservice to agriculture, will, by promoting the feeding of cattle, be an advantage rather than a detriment. (Hear.) I propose, also, that the article of buckwheat shall be subject to the same rule; that maize and buck-wheat, and the flour of maize and buck-wheat, shall be admitted duty free; I propose to admit the meal equally with the grain itself. (Hear, hear.) If any gentleman will ascertain the enormous sums which are now paid by many of the best farmers in the country for the purchase of linseed cake and rape cake, I think they will agree with me, that increased facilities for the introduction of articles that may be used for the fattening of cattle will be no disservice to the agricultural interest. The demand for linseed cake is so great that it is rising in price the consumption on some farms is immense, and upon some, I believe, to the great object of the consumption is to provide manure for the better cultivation of the soil. I will just trouble the House by stating the prices:—

I hold in my hand a letter from a merchant, strongly recommending, on account of the great advantage to the agricultural interest, that there should be a free import of some articles which are used very generally in the United States for fattening cattle. He says "I take the liberty of submitting to your inspection a specimen of rice-feed, which is very extensively used in the United States for feeding cattle. I have apprehend the act of 9 George IV. applies to this; we therefore submit to your consideration whether to the farmer a cheap supply would not be very desirable. It is the refuse of rice ground up, and is less costly than linseed cake." It seems that this material is at present excluded, on the ground that it comes under the description of meal; but I believe that the admission of it would enable us better to enter into competition with the foreign breeder, and would so far be an advantage to agriculture.

I come now to the consideration of those articles of agricultural produce which are immediately connected with the food of man. (Renewed murmurs.) On this great question, on which of course I anticipate much difference of opinion, I have to meet those, on the one hand, who contend for no delay and no qualification (cheers), and, on the other, those who insist that there shall be no relaxation of the present amount of protection. (Cheers.) My object will be, if possible, to reconcile some settlement of this question, in which both sides may concur. (Hear, hear.) I know that neither will approve of it. (Cheers and laughter.) I know, I say, that neither will approve of it. (Renewed cheers.) I know that I must meet the disapprobation, possibly the opposition, of those who usually sit on this side of the House. (Cheers from the Ministerial benches.) Probably I may have to encounter equal resistance from the honourable gentleman opposite. (Cheers from the Opposition side.) But, on the part of her Majesty's Government, I beg to say that our desire is, without favour or undue partiality, to suggest that which we believe to be just, and calculated to terminate that conflict, the continuance of which all must lament. I trust to be able to remove those causes of jealousy and dissension between different classes of her Majesty's subjects, so as not injuriously to affect any one class, and yet to promote the general interest of all. (Cheers.) I consider it for the public advantage at least to lay the foundation of a final settlement. (Much cheering.) I am not about to propose the immediate repeal of the duties imposed upon grain, and what I shall propose will be an earnest of the principle on which we shall act.

I am induced to recommend the immediate reduction of duty on some articles of primary importance in contributing to the food of man. I will first state the articles with respect to which I propose that there shall be either reduction or repeal; as to all, I shall recommend an immediate reduction; but I will first advert to those on which I propose an immediate and total repeal. Speaking of articles of consumption, I propose an extensive review of the duties on all articles included in the tariff which enter into the consumption of the people. As I stated, I propose to make an immediate reduction upon the whole, though not the repeal of the whole. On the part of her Majesty's Government, I recommend that the duty should be immediately reduced to one-half: upon butter, from £1 to 10s.; cheese, from 10s. to 5s.; hops, from £4 10s. to £2 5s. The duty on cured fish I would reduce to 1s per cwt. These are the articles of agricultural produce on which I propose the immediate repeal. I propose also the immediate repeal of the duty on all articles which constitute meat food. I propose that the repeal of the duty on bacon shall be absolute and immediate. On fresh beef, on salt beef, on salt pork, on fresh pork, on poultry, and vegetables of all kinds, the duty shall be forthwith and immediately abolished. (Hear hear.) Everything, then, which enters into the vegetable kingdom, and everything of animal food, shall be admitted at once duty free. (Cheers.) I believe that the agriculturist need fear no foreign competition in consequence of this; for, in dealing with him as with the manufacturer, I conceive that I have given to the agriculturist increased facilities in meeting competition, by removing the duty from all-cake, rape-cake, and linseed-cake, with which he feeds his cattle. Then I propose, having reduced the duty on what may be considered the manufactured articles of food, at once to remove the duty on the importation of animals. I propose, with respect to all animals imported from foreign countries, as a general rule, that they should come in duty free. There is no necessity for retaining the duty on asses, still less on many other animals mentioned in the Tariff (a laugh); but, with respect to all animals, I propose, as a proof of our adherence to the principles which I have laid down. I propose that they, as well as meat, should be free from duty. (Hear, hear.) It has been represented to me, that it is not fair to levy an equal amount of duty on cattle fatted abroad and on lean animals imported from abroad; and it has been said that there would be an advantage to the agriculturist in getting access to the lean animal, whilst there would be none in admitting the fatted animal—at any rate, my proposition will redress that inequality (hear, and a laugh); and I must say that I trust the increased means of fattening cattle which will be afforded, coupled with the great facility of getting lean cattle, and the ready means of converting them into valuable food for the people of this country, will be considered as some compensation for the removal of the duty from the fatted animal. (Hear.) I hope, also, that those connected with agriculture will bear in mind, whilst I am proposing these reductions, that I have already proposed the removal of protection from some of the great articles of manufacture (hear, hear) that I have not directed their attention to the removal of protection from the landed interest only; but that I have called, as I always do call, on the manufacturer to set the first example of the relinquishment of protection. They will bear in mind that the farm-servant can command a cheaper supply of clothing than he could before, and I trust, therefore, that they will not be indisposed to follow the example of those whom I have called on first to relinquish their claims to protection. (Hear.)

Sir, I now will state, with the permission of the House, the proposal which I intend to make on the subject of the Corn-laws (Sensation.) I have already said that I exempt some articles of grain from duty altogether. I have said that maize and buck-wheat will be admitted duty free. (Hear.) Now, on the one hand, though I do not propose the immediate repeal of the Corn laws, I am yet in the hope of making a final adjustment of the question, whilst undue apprehension is prevented, and time is given for the adjustment of agriculture to the new state of circumstances. (Hear, hear.) Though I propose a temporary continuance of protection (hear, hear), I do propose that the bill shall contain a distinct enactment, that, after the lapse of a certain time, foreign grain shall be imported into this country duty free. (Loud cheers.) I am deeply convinced that any immediate proposition would be of no avail. (Renewed cheers.) It would be only to that nominal rate of duty which I propose to apply now at once to maize and buck wheat. (Hear, hear.) The next point which we had to determine was as to what the intermediate state of the law should be during the continuance of protection. My opinion, I am bound to say, as to the policy of providing immediately for a great reduction of the duty on corn remains unchanged. (Hear, hear.) I cannot admit that I took an erroneous estimate—I regret that I was so—I wish I had—but I cannot admit, I say, that I have overstated the amount of pressure which, before the arrival of next harvest, may be felt in many parts of the country. I think, not only looking to the prospects of next spring, but looking to the consequences of a deficiency of food, that it is of the greatest importance to take precautions, as far as the Legislature can take precautions, against the evil day. (Hear, hear.) It is possible that the results of that deficiency may be more extensive and permanent than we think for. I am sure I wish it were possible to take advantage of this calamity in one view, and to extract benefit from it, by introducing amongst the people of Ireland a desire for better food than potatoes afford (cheers), and thus to diminish the chance, to which they will possibly be liable, of a recurrence of this great visitation by which the food of millions of our fellow subjects is rendered uncertain. (Hear, hear.) We have yet to consider what provision is to be made for them—what substitute is to be provided for all the unsound potatoes which, had they been sound, would have formed the food of a majority of the people of Ireland. It is impossible to provide an immediate substitute which would prove satisfactory. You may think that the potato is a most insufficient article of subsistence; but you can't get we of three years to come, do what you will, dispense with the reliance on potatoes. In such a position, the most provident arrangement which can be come to must be suggested.

I am not about to propose now what I proposed on the 1st November, the immediate suspension of the duty on wheat by an Order in Council; but I think it is of importance to make such reductions in the present amount of duties, as shall realise a great part of the advantage which might have been derived from the opening of the ports. I wish to have but one law enduring for the limited period to which I have referred, but I wish in that law to take every necessary precaution against impending danger. (Hear.) I propose, therefore, that there shall be for the present, and immediately, a great reduction in the duty on wheat, and that that amount so reduced shall endure only for a limited period there being a guarantee, by the enactment in the bill, that on the arrival of that period, then the existing duty shall be converted into a mere nominal duty. What, then, shall be the nature of the law which is to endure for a limited period? My colleagues and myself have approached this question wholly unprejudiced, and with no other object in view than the general advancement and prosperity of the country. Our desire has been to propose a law, temporary in its relations, which appears to us, on the whole, best suited to meet the exigencies of the present case, and to be calculated to provide for the wants of the country during the period for which it is intended. The rate of duty under the existing law, on other descriptions of grain, has been regulated by the rate of duty on wheat. We propose, therefore, that the rates of duty on barley, oats, peas, beans, and rye, shall be governed, as nearly as possible, during the continuance of this law, if it meet with the sanction of Parliament, by the principles which will apply to wheat; that is, that there shall be a reduction of a corresponding amount applied to all. But I propose that immediately from the passing of this act, all grain, the produce of British colonial possessions, out of bond, shall be admitted at a nominal duty. (Hear, hear.) I propose that in all cases those restrictions which apply to meal, the produce of grain, shall be removed. I presume that they were established for the protection of the milling interest of this country—I believe them, however, to be wholly unnecessary. They are not applied to flour, the produce of wheat; I see no reason why they should be applied to meal, the produce of barley or any other grain. (Hear, hear.) Now, on the one hand, I offer to those who insist on the immediate and unqualified removal of those laws, the unrestricted importation—at least the importation at a nominal duty—of all kinds of grain, and all kinds of meal, the produce of British colonial possessions, out of bond. One great article, also the produce of the United States—the article of maize—to the free produce of which the United States attaches the utmost importance, we propose should be admitted duty free, and at once. I now come to the provisions with respect to other descriptions of grain, which we propose to adopt during the period whilst foreign grain is to be subjected to duty. We have attempted to meet some of the objections which have been made to varying the rate of duty; at the same time to have fixed any duty which would have been considered valuable in the shape of protection, would not have answered the purpose which we desired to attain—of making an immediate reduction in the price of foreign grain, on account of the temporary exigencies of the country. (Hear, hear.) We propose, therefore, that the enactment to endure for three years shall be to this effect—"That until the 1st day of February, 1849, the following duties shall be levied on wheat if imported from any foreign country—Whenever the average price of wheat, made up and published in the manner required by law, shall be for every quarter under 48s. the duty shall be	..	..	..	10s.

over 48s. and under 49s.	..	..	..	9s.
49s. ..	50s.	..	..	8s.
50s. ..	51s.	..	..	7s.
51s. ..	52s.	..	..	6s.
52s. ..	53s.	..	..	5s.

and that whenever the price of grain made up and published in the manner required by law shall exceed 53s., there shall then be an invariable duty of 4s. per quarter." That is to say, that there shall be no temptation to hold grain when the price shall exceed 54s. for the purpose of securing the shilling of extra duty. (Hear, hear.) The enactments which we shall propose with respect to all other descriptions of grain will precisely follow the scale which we have adopted with regard to wheat. It would, however, perhaps be more convenient for the House, considering the time I have already occupied, that I should rather read them to the details which will be printed to-morrow morning, than go through the whole now as regards oats and barley. (Hear, hear.) It may be sufficient for the present purpose to state that the same general rule will be adopted in all. (Hear, hear.) There would now, therefore, be levied on wheat, instead of a duty of 10s., one of 4s.; and every other grain at the present prices taken out of bond for consumption in the home market, would be subject to a merely nominal duty. (Hear, hear.) That is the arrangement for the adjustment of this great question which her Majesty's Government are induced to offer for the consideration of Parliament. We propose to accompany that arrangement with other provisions calculated—I will not say to give compensation—but calculated, in my firm belief, materially to advance the interests of that portion of the community which, after the lapse of three years, will be called on to relinquish their protection. I believe it is possible to suggest arrangements not affecting the interests of other portions of the community, yet materially benefitting them, by introducing reforms in the levying of duties, and in the application of the burdens which are to be raised. I thank them for having permitted me, without interruption, to state all these particulars of my proposal which must appear to be bearing heavily on them. I am obliged to them for the patience with which they have permitted me to go through that part of my proposed measure. (Hear, hear.) I will now state what are the measures with which we propose to accompany this great present reduction—this immediate extinction of protection—measures which, I believe, will prove great to the advantage of that interest in whose welfare this country is deeply interested. (Hear, hear.) Let us review some of the burdens which do fall immediately on the land; but burdens which are, in my opinion some of them, at least capable of alleviation, not by their transfer to other parties, but by the introduction of reforms into the mode of their levy. Now, first let me take the existing arrangement with respect to one great source of expenditure—to one great burden which is constantly and justly complained of by the agriculturists—I mean the amount of rate which is levied for highways. (Hear, hear.) Is it not possible, without subjecting other parties to the expense of maintaining the highways, to introduce reforms into the mode of raising the highway rate which might be advantageous to the agriculturists? I believe it is possible. (Hear, hear.) What is the law at present with respect to highways? There are 15,000 local authorities, each of which has charge of the highways. As roads advance, whilst turnpike roads are, in many cases, becoming of little importance, highways, which have hitherto been of little advantage to the public, are becoming of increased importance. But where a highway is a continuous channel of communication passing through different parishes, that same highway is under the control of every parish through which it passes, and, as I have before said, the local number of parish authorities is not less than 15,000. The practice for levying up the repair of the roads is to have a nominal appointment of a paid surveyor in each parish, who absolutely knows nothing whatever of the construction of roads (hear, hear, hear); or even if they did if they had double the ability which they do possess, the existence of different surveyors on one highway is necessarily a defective arrangement. That each portion of the highway should be subject to a parochial authority, distinct from the other portions in other parishes, and that the highway should be thus subjected to numerous local authorities, must evidently tend to increased outlay, to great abuse, and generally to a laxity of expenditure, and a bad system of repair, which it is desirous should be avoided in future. (Hear, hear.) There is at present an existence an act of Parliament which permits the voluntary union of parishes into local districts, for the purpose of the more effectual superintendence and repair of the roads; but as the union of the parishes for that purpose is required under the act to be voluntary, there is hardly any instance in which that union has taken place, in which the voluntary power of forming such a district has been exercised. What I propose is this and in proposing, I do not bring it forward as a relief to the agriculturist from any burden, but as a means of benefitting the agricultural interests, by greatly improving the communication by highways throughout the country. (Hear, hear.) I propose, therefore, that what is now a power of voluntary union on the part of the parishes should be made compulsory. That is, if we adopt the same extent of district for those local unions as that which is selected for the poor-law unions, it will give six hundred local authorities throughout the country; and I propose to compel the parishes in those districts to form such unions, for the purpose of the superintendence and repair of the roads. (Hear, hear.) I also propose that such union, when so formed, should have the power of appointing a surveyor of the roads for that particular district; the surveyor so appointed to be a properly-qualified professional man, who is to have the entire charge of the roads in his district. Some cases of the voluntary union of parishes do exist at present, as I have before stated; and I wish to remind the House, before I proceed further, of the effects which have been produced by the adoption of these unions, and the substitution, for a parochial management, of a central management under the direction of a surveyor. (Hear, hear.) I hold in my hand a return relating to a district in the north, in which parochial management has been superseded, and a district of seventy miles in extent formed for the purpose of carrying into effect a better mode than that which prevailed under parochial management. The return has been derived from the surveyor of that district of a county surveyor. The result of the improved system of central management is thus described:—

[Here the right hon. Baronet read a return from the parishes within the district of seventy miles, from which it appeared that under the old system the cost of repairing and surveying the roads was from 6d. to 9d. in the pound, whilst the money, at the same time, was thrown away; whereas, under the centralized system, the expense was no more than from 1½d. to 3d. in the pound, and the work done in the best manner. In nine adjoining parishes, which had not adopted the system of voluntary union, the expense of repairing, &c., was from 4½d. to 5d. in the pound.] That is not a transfer of any burden, whilst it will go a great way in improving the channels of communication, and thus so far tend to the benefit of the agricultural interest, and relieve them, to a certain extent, of a burden which they bear. That is, therefore, one system by which I propose to relieve the agricultural interest, and it can be effected without transferring it to others, but by a better arrangement of our existing institutions. I will now direct the attention of the House to a law which has been greatly complained of by the agricultural interest—I mean the present Law of Settlement. (Hear, hear, from the agricultural representatives.) It happens, under the present Law of Settlement, that a large portion of the population of rural districts are induced, in times of great manufacturing prosperity, to move into the manufacturing districts, and it happens frequently, that the power, the labour, and the best part of a man's life, who so removes, are consumed in that manufacturing district, and thus all the advantage of his strength and good conduct, and industry, are derived by the manufacturing district during the period of his residence. (Hear, hear.) A revulsion comes in due course—the manufacturing districts are not prosperous, and what course is taken with respect to the man who moved in more prosperous times from the rural to the manufacturing districts? The man, with his wife and family, is sent back to the rural districts (hear, hear); and the individual who spent the best part of his life as a manufacturing operative, and who, perhaps, was not very provident during the time of his best labour, is returned to the rural district from which he originally came—returned unfit for an agricultural occupation. (Hear, hear.) Under these circumstances the man is sent, against his will, to a new home, at a period when all his communications with that district have been interrupted and with no means of earning an honest livelihood, a proceeding which must shock the feelings of every man who witnesses it. (Hear, hear.) In proposing an alteration of the system under which these circumstances take place, I am not merely doing an act of justice, but also preventing an act of injustice to the labouring man. The proposal is not therefore merely that an industrial residence of five years should give a settlement, but that the power of removeability should be taken away in the case of that man. (Loud cheers.) We propose that after an industrial residence of five years, after a man has laboured for a period of five years in a district, his settlement shall not be in the place where he had originally a settlement, but in the district to which his industry and labour had been given during those five years. (Cheers.) The House may recollect what passed in 1842. In 1842 great distress prevailed in the manufacturing districts, and the practice adopted in consequence of this distress was, that the men who had originally a settlement in agricultural districts were returned to them, after having laboured in the manufacturing districts. Now I conceive that what we propose is a great moral improvement in the law of settlement (hear, hear, and cheers), and an improvement which will prove a just relief to the rural districts, but the great advantage of which will be the avoidance of an act of injustice to the labouring man. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) I propose, on the part of the Government, that from the passing of the measure which we shall introduce with reference to this subject, no person who has resided five years in a parish shall be removed from that parish, and no residence in a prison, or a barrack, or lunatic asylum, or an hospital in that parish, or no period during which the individual was receiving public relief, shall be reckoned in those five years, or, on the other hand, be an interruption (Hear, hear.) I propose that there shall not only be no power to remove that man, but that there shall be no power to remove his wife or his children, legitimate or illegitimate, under sixteen years of age—that those children shall be permitted to reside with the father and mother, for there is to be no power to remove them when the removal of the man himself is prevented. There is to be no separation of the children from the parent in this case (great cheering), or of the man so situated from his family (Cheers.) The man who labours for five years in a district of which he is not a native, is thus not to be sent to the place of his original settlement. Under the present system, immediately on the death of a labouring man in a manufacturing district, of which he happens not to be a native, his widow can be removed to the parish in which she had her settlement; but we propose that no widow can be removable, for twelve months after the death of her husband, from the parish in which he resided at the time of his death. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) At present, when a man situated as the individual I have described begins to fall in a manufacturing district perhaps, from having undergone extreme labour—and apprehension begins to be entertained that he may become a permanent incumbrance on the parish, and steps are accordingly taken for an early removal of that man to his original settlement; now, I propose that he shall not be removable, after five years' labour, on the ground of sickness or accident; that no such ground as sickness or accident shall be alleged as the cause of the removal of such a man or his family from a manufacturing to an agricultural district. (Hear, hear.) This alteration in the Law of Settlement which I propose, will be found to be a great social advantage, whilst it will relieve the agricultural interest of a burden which at present it is subject to. In proposing this alteration, I am doing only what is just to the place of the man's original settlement, and preventing an injustice from being done to the man who, for a certain period, employed his labour in a manufacturing district. (Hear, hear.) The next measure which I am prepared, on the part of her Majesty's Government, to advise, is one that, without loss to any party in the community, will confer great advantage on others. There is a dread a natural dread of competition with our agriculture, on the occasion of the present Corn-law; and, I must add, it is impossible to deny that agricultural science is as yet in its infancy in this country, and that opportunities are afforded for effecting immense improvements in that department, and thus affording the means of meeting competition. (Hear, hear.) There are opportunities of enabling the British farmer, by the skill, capital, and industry of this country, to meet any competition which might be entered into by other countries. (Cheers.) Now, we recommend that the State should encourage improvements in agricultural science, and we propose that, for this purpose, the State should give facilities for carrying on such improvements in a certain way. Look at the Committee of last year, at which the Duke of Richmond presided; look at the evidence before that Committee with respect to the improvement of estates: that evidence shows that great opportunities of improvement exist where the means were afforded, and that large and extensive districts of the country at present exist to afford a wide and profitable field for the application of these improvements. I believe that those facilities exist—I believe that their introduction would greatly increase the produce of this country. (Hear, hear.) Difficulties are no doubt to be met, and those difficulties are alluded to in the report of the Committee which I have just mentioned; but there have been also proposed various schemes for effecting the necessary improvements in agriculture, and amongst them are some which have been brought forward by my hon. friend the member for Berkshire. Amongst the principal difficulties to be encountered are the necessary intervention of the Court of Chancery in many cases, and the difficulty of raising sufficient sums for that purpose, and obtaining sufficient security for its repayment, as well as the interest, in case of failure. Now, we recommend that the public credit of the State should be lent for the purpose of encouraging improvements, but we intend that it shall be done in a manner which will not subject the public to any loss, whilst money can be thus afforded on certain terms which we will name for the purpose of affording every facility for agricultural improvement. I see a great deal of advantage likely to arise from that recommendation, and I will now lay before the House the manner in which we propose to effect it. At present, we advance Exchequer-bill loans on sufficient security; now I would advise the application of the public credit to the encouragement of improvements in such a manner as perfectly to guard the public against any loss. We propose that the Exchequer bill Commissioners should lend a sufficient sum of money to effect agricultural improvements, on due securities, and we will take advantage of another Board, already in existence the Board of Enclosures—for the purpose of facilitating those improvements. We recommend that a landed proprietor, wishing to effect improvements, should make an application to the Enclosure Commissioners, to inquire into the nature and extent of the improvements proposed, and we recommend that the preliminary survey should be made at the expense of the proprietor so applying, in order to prevent all frivolous applications. After a full investigation on the part of the Enclosure Commissioners, a certificate is to be issued by those Commissioners, warranting the Exchequer-bill Loan Commissioners to advance a certain sum, such as may be required for the improvement so specified, and providing by the terms of the advance of a sufficient payment of a moderate rate of interest, and a repayment of the principal by annual instalments, the rent charge thus created to be taken as prior to all other charges, except any other party having a prior claim to the land should object to it. I believe, however, that there will be few cases in which an objection will be made by such a party to the effecting of the improvement on the terms which I have mentioned, as those improvements would be the best guarantee for new charges on the estate. We propose that parties who have a prior claim on the land shall only be prior to the rent charge thus created, and that in case they shall object to the advance, it may not be done without the consent of the Court of Chancery. We believe that we shall thus be enabled to remove the objection which at present applies with respect to the difficulty that exists as regards improvements of entailed estates, and that we shall be enabled to obviate the great expense attending appeals to the Court of Chancery in such cases, thus removing the difficulties which now prevent advances on the part of private companies, and that thus great advantages will be conferred. I believe that a spirit of improvement will take place, and that the landlords, under scientific direction, will be enabled to improve their estates, and that the stimulation and emulation thus excited will lead to a general spirit of agricultural improvement. (Hear, hear.) Well, that's another mode by which we propose to enable the landed interest to meet the competition to which they will be exposed at the termination of the present Corn-laws. With respect to direct local burdens, her Majesty's Government have devoted serious considerations to that subject, and I must say that I cannot advise any material alteration of the present system of assessment. There is now raised an immense sum of money by this assessment, which is partly applied to the sustenance and relief of the poor, and partly for other objects. It is said, and with apparent justice, that this charge bears on the agricultural interest, that it ought to be relaxed, and the manner of levying it altered. Now, in point of fact, it is not a charge on the land; the opposition is not between the country and the manufacturing districts—not between land and houses—but between real and personal property (hear, hear); for whether real property is in houses or manufactures, where industry is employed it is subjected to the assessment for poor rates. If this were a general charge—if the Government undertook the general support of the poor, it might be advantageous to make personal property subject to the support of the poor. But this assessment to which I refer—this charge for the support of the poor—is a local charge and not a general one. (Hear, hear, hear.) The land would have no advantage if the personal property of Manchester were all made to contribute to the poor rates. It would be no advantage to the land of the north of England, if the inhabitants of Halifax, Stockport, and Macclesfield were rated in this manner, for this charge. You may say, subject personal as well as real property to the assessment. If you do this, you must subject it to the assessment in the rural as well as in the manufacturing districts. If you did so, how, I ask, would you levy so small a charge upon personal property as it would be in many cases? It might be possible to do so with great sums, and on urgent occasions; but when you come to levy minute sums for the relief of the poor on personal property in rural districts you would find that the attempt would not be so successful. (Hear, hear.) To raise minute sums by any inquisition on the part of local authorities would prove a great burden on land in the rural districts. (Hear.) There are districts partly agricultural and partly manufacturing, and there you may say this mode of assessment is unjust; but whether or no, I am not prepared to suggest such a remedy as this inquisition into personal property for the purpose of assessment. I do not think that it would be an advantage to the land that there should be an inquisition by local authorities, in order to levy this tax on personal property. If an inquiry were made into the profits of trade for the purpose of this assessment, an inquiry should take place into the profits of the farmer. You had an inquiry into personal property before, under another act, but you abandoned it because you found it impossible. If you established it in this case, I see no advantage that would arise to the agricultural interest, and I am sure that if the State took upon itself the maintenance of the poor, it would be an arrangement open to the greatest objections, and as the charge is at present not a general but a local one, I do not believe that the landed interest would be benefitted by this assessment of personal property for the poor rates. I have not therefore, proposed any material alteration as to the principle on which the rates are at present levied. I always thought that the agricultural interest had a fair claim to direct relief from some local burdens, and, looking at those which affect the land exclusively, we propose to take some of them off. I cannot mention this as a direct compensation, but I believe it will be found to lay the foundation of great social improvement if the public take upon them some of these charges. The honourable member for Somersetshire brought some of those burdens under the consideration of the House last year. I then said that while we retained protection I would not advise the agricultural interest to seek the relief then sought, as that relief would be comparatively small. But when we remove protection from the agricultural interest, I think it is in our power to relieve the land to a certain extent and effect further social improvement. You have already taken upon yourselves half the expense of maintaining prisoners while in gaol before trial, and also half the expense of lunatic asylums. You have also relieved the county of the charge of maintaining convicts while in prison, and of removing convicts under sentence of transportation. We propose to relieve the country from these expenses altogether, and to throw the charge entirely upon the Consolidated Fund. When I say the Consolidated Fund, I do not mean to say that these expenses shall be paid without inquiry, and therefore I propose, in order that there may be a constant and vigilant check upon the expenditure of the country, that the necessary amount shall be provided for by an annual vote. With respect to the expenses of prosecutions in England, one-half of that charge is already paid out of the public purse, the other half by the county in which the prosecution takes place. In Scotland the charge is paid altogether by the country. In Ireland a portion of the charge still remains imposed upon the land. We propose that in the case of England and Ireland that portion of the expenses of prosecutions which is now defrayed by the county out of the local rates shall be borne by the country at large. The relief will not be great, but it will at the same time afford you the means of establishing some control over prosecutions (hear, hear), and thus, in a social point of view, the country will be amply repaid for the addition thereby made to the public burdens. In Scotland, an admirable system of checking prosecutions, by means of a public prosecutor, has for some time existed. (Hear, hear.) In Ireland, you have a control of the same kind, by requiring that in all prosecutions there shall be the consent of a public officer before the prosecution can be instituted. With a view, therefore, partly to the relief which the land will receive, and partly to the means of supervision which will be thereby afforded, I propose that the whole charge of prosecutions shall be taken from the land and placed upon the Consolidated Fund. The expense which this will occasion will be £17,000 for Ireland; but, in England, it will not be less than £100,000. When I speak of Ireland, let it not be forgotten, that, if there be any part of the United Kingdom which will suffer from the withdrawal of protection to agriculture, that part of the United Kingdom will be a loser by the course which we have recommended. Its capital and its enterprise are almost exclusively directed to agricultural pursuits. If therefore, there should appear at first any undue favour shown to Ireland, let it be borne in mind that Ireland has not the means which other parts of the United Kingdom possess of employing labour in manufactures. It must also be recollected at the same time that we propose no relief from burdens which is not accompanied with some great social benefit to the whole of the community At present there is a large police force established in Ireland. The expense of maintaining that force falls partly on the county, and partly on the public at large. This seems to me, I confess, an anomalous system. (Hear, hear, hear.) I think that it would be a great advantage to place that force under the control of the Executive Government, and to make it as perfect a system as you can, excluding all power of local nomination and local interference. This course was strongly recommended by the commission over which Lord Devon presided, without any reference to the withdrawal of protection from agriculture, and therefore her Majesty's Government are disposed to recommend that the charge of maintaining the police force in Ireland shall be wholly borne by the public treasury. There is another charge borne by the land in this country, which, with a view to the social advantages which will result from the change, we propose to transfer to the Consolidated Fund. I allude to medical relief. There is no part of the administration of the Poor-laws which gives more dissatisfaction than the administration of medical relief. (Hear, hear.) There has been often great unwillingness on the part of the guardians to provide proper means for visiting and relieving the sick poor, and, I am sorry to say, there have been frequently just grounds of complaint with respect to medical attendance. The state of medical relief in Scotland, also, has frequently attracted the attention of the House during the last Session of Parliament. We propose, therefore, at first gradually introducing an amended system of medical relief to the poor, we propose that the public shall pay half the charge of medical officers. I estimate that the amount of relief which the land will receive by this plan will, in England, amount to not less than £100,000, and will amount to about £15,000 in Scotland. Ireland stands in a different position in this respect, and the circumstances in which it is placed will shortly occupy the attention of the other House of Parliament. There is a separate charge which falls on the land in Scotland, from which, I think, it is entitled to be relieved. The charge of the Model Prison at Pentonville is borne by the country generally, and Scotland objects that the expense of maintaining the prison at Perth ought not to fall upon her exclusively. It is but a very small amount, but Scotland wishes to be relieved from it, more, perhaps, as a matter of feeling, than on account of the burden which it casts upon the people of that country, who see that the prison for which the establishment at Parkhurst, in the Isle of Wight, supported at the public expense. There is only one other item of expenditure which I propose to take off from the land, but on which, I think, I shall have the general acquiescence of the House. I believe that, in many parish workhouses, there is great ground of complaint, on account of the inadequate provision made for education. In many workhouses, persons who are perfectly unfit to be trusted with the education of youth, have been appointed schoolmasters. We propose not to interfere with the right of the guardians to appoint these persons, as we do not wish to raise any question about their religious tenets. The right of appointment, therefore, shall remain with the guardians, but the Government will be ready to bear the expense. We shall require the right of examination, of inspection, and of dismissal; but we are ready to provide a competent and decent salary for those who are to perform the task of instruction. We propose that a sum of £30,000 a-year shall be devoted to the purpose of providing competent salaries for schoolmasters and schoolmistresses for the children of the destitute poor, taking at the same time upon ourselves so much of control as shall not amount to interference with the right of election, but requiring that the person appointed shall be competent to discharge the duties of the situation. I propose also that the salaries of auditors of Poor-law Unions shall be paid out of the public treasury, on the same ground as those upon which the Poor-law Commissioners are paid from the same source. If this general scheme shall meet with the approbation of the House, observe what it does for the great body of people in this country At a very early period all legislative restrictions on food will be entirely removed. Many of those restrictions will be removed immediately. With regard to clothing, the purchaser may at once go into the cheapest market. A great improvement will be introduced in respect to medical attendance. Before this measure be rejected, I do hope that both parties in this House, though their immediate views may not be consulted, will consider that, in respect to many articles of food there will be an immediate removal of restrictions, and that, with respect to all, there will be a free importation at an early period. I trust, however, that the whole measure may be fairly and temperately considered; and that, on each side, you will reflect on the consequences of an immediate rejection of this scheme. I ask for no expression of opinion upon it this evening. I hope that, after an interval of some days, we shall approach the consideration of the final result in the same temper of mind in which, on both sides of the House, you have listened to my explanation of the views of the Government. (Hear, hear.) Now, let me conclude with two observations, one connected with our foreign policy and the interests of our commercial intercourse with other countries, the other having reference to our own domestic prosperity. I fairly avow to you, that, in making this great reduction on the imports of articles which are the produce of other countries, I have no guarantee that other countries will follow our example. (Hear, hear.) I give you the advantage of the admission that her Majesty's Government, worn out with long-continued efforts to make other countries give us a fair equivalent, have determined to pursue their own course, and that we, on the behalf of this country, have resolved to consult our own interest, and not to punish both other countries and ourselves by encouraging high duties, and with high duties a contraband trade. (Cheers.) We have had no communication with any other Government on this subject. I cannot promise you that France will give us an equivalent for the reductions made on articles which are the produce of that country; nor that Russia will evince her gratitude for the policy of reducing the duty on tallow; you may therefore say to me, "You are giving away all these duties, and you get nothing in return." I may be told, and with truth, that many foreign countries, which have benefitted by the reductions which we have already made, have not followed our example, but have actually applied to British goods higher rates of duty than were imposed upon them before. (Hear, hear.) I give you the whole benefit of that argument. I rely on that fact as a conclusive proof of the policy of the course which we have pursued. It is undoubtedly the fact that they have not followed our example. But look at the state of our export trade. You have defied the regulations of other countries, and your export trade has greatly increased. This is owing partly, perhaps, to the smuggling, which, with [illegible] ingenuity have penetrated the triple cordon which was established to exclude our manufactures; and partly, perhaps, to the circumstance that the inhabitants of the countries to which I refer have not the advantages which enable you to enter into competition with them. But your exports, whatever the tariffs of other countries may be, are a clear indication that the trade of this country with foreign countries is increasing. You have defied your competitors in the market, and, notwithstanding hostile tariffs, the declared value of the exports of this country, and who it to the extent of £10,000,000 during the period since the reductions in our tariff have been made. I say, therefore, that you may depend upon it, that the example which you have set will ultimately be followed. When your example could be quoted in favour of restriction upon restriction, it was quoted and acted upon, and, you may rely upon it, that when your example can be quoted in favour of relaxation of restriction, it will not be without its effect. It may not act at first upon foreign Governments or Boards of Trade, but ultimately the true interests of commerce will prevail, and, in spite of the desire of foreign Governments and Boards of Trade to raise revenue, the voice of reason will at last be heard. I see some symptoms already of an alliance to the principles by which we have been guided. Look at the Report of the Secretary to the Treasury of the United States, Mr. Walker. That shows that your example has not been unavailing. The Report made by him, containing many enlarged views on the subject of commerce, speaks thus, on the question of foreign trade:—"By counterveiling restrictions, we injure our own fellow-citizens much more than the foreign nation at whom we purpose to aim them force, and in the conflict of opposing tariffs we sacrifice our own commerce, agriculture, and navigation. As well might we impose monarchical or aristocratical restrictions on our Government or people, because that is the course of foreign legislation. Let our commerce be as free as our political institutions. Let us, with revenue duties only open our ports to all the world, and nation after nation will soon follow our example." He says also, "If the question is asked, who shall begin the work of reciprocal reduction? it is answered by the fact that England has already abated her duties upon most of our exports. She has repealed the duty upon cotton, and greatly reduced the tariff upon the breadstuffs, provisions, and other articles; and her present bad harvest, accompanied by a reduction of our tariff, would lead to the repeal of her Corn-laws, and the unrestricted admission of those articles at all times of our own growth." Here is a direct homage to the course which you have already pursued. Here is an admission that without any preliminary stipulation you reduced the duty on cotton, and the United States has now admitted that the time is come when she must follow your example. In other parts of Europe, where the form of Government is totally different from that of the United States, I could give you proof that your example is producing a considerable effect. I could quote the instance of a state, as different from the United States as can be, where your commercial principles are growing into favour. In Naples, liberal views on commercial subjects are beginning to prevail. (Hear, hear.) I must say, in justice to the Sovereign who now rules over that country, and who takes a personal part in the administration of that branch of affairs, that I have seen documents on commercial subjects from his pen, in which the principles of commercial intercourse are enunciated with as much correctness as if he had been a professor of political economy. That Sovereign is constantly urging upon his Ministers the relaxation of duties; and I am convinced that at at an early period we may look for a reduction of the duties levied upon articles of our manufacture. I see reason to think that the same course will, at no remote period, be followed both in Sweden and Norway. Austria has shown some disposition, at least, not to follow the example set her by neighbouring countries; and Hanover, also, has taken her own course in commercial legislation. I do not despair, therefore, that the time will arrive when your example will act upon other countries. I trust that the improved intercourse which will ensue from it will constitute a new bond of peace. I do hope that the lovers and friends of peace between all nations will derive material strength from the example which I advise to be followed by the removal of impediments to commercial intercourse. But observe, that the continuance of peace will expose us to greater competition. The greater the certainty of the continuance of peace, the greater will be the efforts which you must make to maintain your commercial position. During the last war we commanded the means of supplying every nation; but peace has produced not only new consumers, but also formidable manufacturing rivals in countries, of great importance to us to maintain the position to which we have reached. Now, I do firmly think that the abundance and cheapness of provisions is one of the constituents by which the continuance of commercial pre-eminence may be maintained. You may say that the object of these alterations is to foster the love of gain, and to minister to the desire of accumulating money. I advise these measures on no such grounds. I believe that the accumulation of wealth, that is to say, the increase of capital, is a main element, is one of the means, by which we can maintain the pre-eminent position which we have long held. But I have attempted to show that the abundance of provisions and the security—which is a main guarantee for the continuance of that abundance—not only contribute to the accumulation of wealth, but that they are directly conducive to the alleviation of public burdens by the increase of revenue—to the alleviation of local burdens by diminishing the pressure of local claims; but, above all, that they are conducive to the spread of morality, by diminishing those temptations to crime which arise from poverty and distress. (Hear, hear.)

I ask you, therefore, to give your consent to these measures, not on any narrow view, or principle connected with the accumulation of wealth; but I ask you to give your consent to them on far higher grounds—far higher principles. Encumbered as you are by heavy burdens, solicitous as you are to provide for the public credit, depend upon it the true source of increased revenue is increased comfort and increased taste for luxury. Thus, I say, are the interests of the revenue promoted by that unseen and voluntary taxation which arises from the enlarged consumption of articles of general use. I ask you to consent to the scheme you have just heard, on the proof which I have adduced, that abundance and cheapness lead to diminished crime and to increased morality (Loud cheers) Of what are the usual, nay, the almost necessary effects of that cheapness and that abundance, I could give you many examples. "But why," I hear it said, "if there be no actual scarcity, and no danger of scarcity, why interfere?" (Conservative cheers.) Now what is scarcity? It is a relative term. (Hear, hear, from the Opposition.) That which is not scarcity to us may be scarcity to others. But scarcity is a relative term in respect to times as well as persons. Remember this, that the lapse of three years of plenty brings us to an important era in a nation's history. The late abundance of provisions, and consequent comparative cheapness, have altered the character and the feelings of the people (Hear, hear.) That which was not scarcity in the hard winter of 1842 would be scarcity now (hear, hear), that which would not have been then a denial of comforts almost equal to the necessaries of life would be severely felt now. (Hear, hear.) There would be much more real suffering sustained in 1846, after the enjoyment of three years of comparative abundance, by the people now being put upon anything like a short allowance of food, than there would have been under similar circumstances in 1843. Now, I advise that we do not check the genial current of prosperity which has so long prevailed. (Hear, hear.) We have had three abundant harvests. Now, do not mistake me I am not insensible to the advantages of plenty arising from the abundance of home produce, which the bounty of Providence may favour us with. I do not say that any importation of corn from foreign countries can supply or compensate for the advantages we derive from abundant harvests of our own. But I ask you to consider whether or not such a consideration forms a reason why, if there be danger of a deficient supply at home, we should not remedy the evil as well as we can, by permitting importation from abroad? (Cheers) I was told the other day that, in the instance of a battalion of the Guards, quartered in Ireland, an increase in the number of applications for the furlough granted to private soldiers had taken place within the last three years. I inquired what was the reason The House may think the anecdote trifling, but I confess it made a great impression upon my mind. I was told, I say, that the reason for the rapid increase in the number of applications for furlough in fact, for twice the number of soldiers applying in 1845 for the privilege than had sought for it in previous years—and the number of applicants is still on the increase I was told, I say, Sir, that the reason was this—that the friends of these soldiers were at present in such comfortable circumstances, that the men were constantly receiving invitations to pass some time in the country, and it was in this way the increase was to be accounted for. (Hear, hear, and some laughter.) Sir, honourable members may think the matter trifling, but it seems to me a striking instance of the moral advantages produced by the command of an abundant supply of food. We see abundance here facilitating the intercourse of kindly affection. We see it permitting those who are divided in periods of difficulty and distress—permitting the soldier to revisit his home, and then to return, I hope imbued with feelings which would qualify him for the still better performance of his duty than those with which he had for a time left it. (Cheers and laughter.) Now I was asked the other night why I am disposed to disturb this state of prosperity to which I allude. I was told the other night that I had admitted that during a period of three years there had been comparative abundance and comparative prosperity—that that abundance and prosperity had co-existed with the Corn-law of 1842, and where then was the necessity for disturbing the arrangement then made. Sir, my answer is this. That up to the month of October last the indications of the prosperity in question did exist; but that during that month, and for the two or three which have elapsed since, there has been an apparent sympathy between the prosperity of the manufacturing districts and the price of wheat. (Hear, hear.) One of the circulars issued from Manchester, containing an account of the state of trade in that town, and dated the 22nd of the present January, contains the following passage:—

"The anticipations which we ventured to make in our last annual circular, as to the prospects of the year we had then just entered upon, were fully realised for the first nine months, during which we enjoyed not only a continuance of the prosperity of 1844, but had reached to a degree unexampled in our manufacturing history extending to every branch, and acting powerfully on the social condition of our teeming population. The causes which combined to produce this state of things were, as in the former year, steadiness of prices, with a demand constantly keeping pace with the supply; low rates for the raw material, abundance of money at a moderate rate of interest, with a discriminating and careful management of our banking institutions; regular and full employment for all classes of our operatives, with cheap and abundant food, and the absence of any political event threatening either our domestic peace or foreign relations, to which may be added, the wise and comprehensive fiscal measures of the last session of Parliament. Unhappily, we have latterly experienced a reverse in several of these elements of prosperity, which, acting on each other, led to a state of embarrassment under which we laboured for the last three months of the year, and are still labouring, though in a mitigated form. Our home trade demand, up to the end of September, was on an unprecedentedly large scale, but from the causes above-mentioned, an almost total suspension took place for the two succeeding months, which has been followed since by a moderate business only."

We are not, therefore, to conclude that up to the time at which I am speaking these indications of prosperity continued unabated. The events which have passed since the month of October, 1845, have certainly constituted one of the greatest checks to trade which I have ever had to conclusion which I have arrived at. (Hear, hear.) And now, Mr. Greene, these are the proposals which, upon the part of her Majesty's Government, I offer for the adjustment—for the ultimate adjustment—of this great question. I cannot appeal to any ungenerous feelings of fear—to anything which can unduly sway your minds—as a reason for your listening with patience to my propositions. There may be agitation, but it is not agitation which has reached the great mass of the labouring community. There has been a total absence of all popular excitement. I admit, therefore, that it is possible, without danger to the public peace, to continue the existing law; I cannot, therefore, appeal to your fears. But I tell you that there has occurred a great change in the opinion of a vast proportion of the community on the subject of the Corn-laws—(Loud Opposition cheering) that there exists between the master manufacturer and the operative classes a common conviction, which did not prevail in 1842, or in any previous year, that it is for the public advantage that these laws should be altered -(Loud cheers); but I believe that although there undoubtedly does prevail that union of sentiment on the subject, I cannot say that there is co-existent with it anything but general contentment, general loyalty, and a deep-seated confidence in the justice and wisdom of the decisions of this House. So far as I can judge, the example which you have set in taking on yourselves great pecuniary burdens, in order that you might relieve the labouring classes from the taxation to which they were subject, has produced the deepest impression, and the most beneficial effect. I repeat that I believe there exists a perfect confidence in your judgment and your wisdom. But, although this is a time of peace and plenty—although there prevails a perfect calm, excepting so far as agitation among the manufacturing districts may interrupt it ("hear," and a laugh)—although you are now not subject to any coercion, I entreat you to bear in mind that the aspect of affairs may be changed (hear) that we may have to contend with worse harvests than that which we have lately gathered, and that it may be wise to avail ourselves of the present time for effecting an adjustment an adjustment which, I believe, must ultimately take place, and which cannot be long protracted, without engendering those feelings of animosity between different classes of her Majesty's subjects. (Cheers.) From the sincere belief which I entertain that that settlement must be brought about from the sincere hope which I feel that, coupled with the precautionary measures to which I have referred, it will not inflict injury on the agricultural interest—from these feelings, and with these feelings, I should deeply lament—on public grounds exclusively—the failure of the measures which, on the part of her Majesty's Government, I have, on the present occasion, recommended to your calm and dispassionate consideration, and recommended, mind, with no feeling, with no interest in the ultimate issue, other than that it may prove, in the words of the Royal Speech, conducive to the maintenance of friendly feeling between the different classes of the community, a security for the permanence of peace, and an assurance for the contentment and loyalty of all classes, of all ranks of her Majesty's subjects, by increasing the comforts, and bettering the condition, of the great body of the people.

The right hon. Baronet resumed his seat amid considerable Opposition cheering. His speech occupied three hours and twenty-five minutes in the delivery

The following Resolutions, which we copy from the Votes, were then read by the Clerk at the table:—

When the above Resolutions had been read, Sir R. PEEL said that he wished to consult the convenience of the House, in appointing a time for the discussion on them. He wished that ample time should be given to their consideration of the great questions involved in them; and he should suggest ("Monday," from several voices on the Opposition benches.) If the House desired it to be Monday (" No, no," from the Ministerial side of the House.) He had not the slightest wish to hurry the question, and he would put it to the House, whether the debate might not be taken on that night (Tuesday) week.

Sir H. HOUGHTON said, his right hon. friend had stated, in the first instance, that his speech would be of a commercial, and not of a financial character; but, he apprehended that the House would find it impossible to comprehend clearly the speech of his right hon. friend, unless his right hon. friend stated, in general terms at least, the amount of the burden he proposed to take off, and to transfer to the direct account of the State. There appeared to be a direct expenditure of about £6,000,000 on the amount of the different items enumerated in his right hon. friend in the latter portion of his speech. What he (Sir R. Inglis) wished to know was, the amount of revenue likely to be lost by the non-receipt of duties proposed by his right hon. friend, as it was absolutely necessary to regulate the measures of far less importance than this, he (Mr. S. O'B.) would impress on the right hon. Baronet that a "little fortnight" was not too much to grant the agriculturists of this country, for the purpose of considering it. He was surprised that the other side of the House, who professed to have all the argument with them on the matter, should shrink from the full discussion of it.

Mr. HUME said it was not his side of the House that shrunk from the discussion, but that of the hon. gentleman: they were quite anxious for a discussion; and as to the argument of the hon. gentleman about waiting for the expression of constituents' opinions, he would remind the hon. gentleman that he was not to judge for those in the provinces, returned as their representative, but not as their delegate (Hear.) The hon. gentleman had heard the statements of the right hon. Baronet, and he could reply to them if he came prepared with the requisite documents. He (Mr. H.) therefore hoped that the honourable gentleman would meet the discussion manfully and fairly, and not seek to avoid it, or throw it over by the side wind of a postponement.

Sir R. PEEL hoped that the discussion would proceed, as it had commenced, without anything of anger in its character. All he asked of hon. gentlemen was to allow him to conduct his own case. (Laughter.) Some hon. gentlemen connected with agriculture desired that the discussion should be that day week. Hon. gentlemen would bear in mind that the acceptance or rejection of the measure proposed was a matter of importance to the country; but as its fate would ultimately depend upon the opinions expressed by the great body of the community, he should be the last to object to any reasonable delay. What he wished was the fullest discussion for it; and if Lord Worsley, or any other hon. gentleman, had a great inconvenience if the appointments had not an ample opportunity of knowing it in all its bearings. He therefore proposed Thursday week to meet the wishes of all parties.

Mr. W. MILES said that he did not speak alone for agriculture, in asking for further delay before the discussion of the right hon. Baronet's proposition took place, but he spoke, likewise for the various interests which would be affected for weal or woe by the measure. Whatever the League or its friends might say on the question, it was absolutely necessary that the country should thoroughly understand all the various reductions and modifications of duties proposed to be made by the right hon. Baronet before that House came to a decision upon the subject. He begged to recall to mind the time that was given for consideration of the Income-tax, when it was introduced by the right hon. Baronet. The discussion on that measure did not take place for seven weeks. He was quite aware that measures involving money transactions ought not to be kept in a state of unnecessary suspense, but, on account of the great importance of the present measure to the whole community — agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing — he hoped the right hon. Baronet would see the propriety of delaying the discussion of his propositions for a reasonable period.

Sir R. PEEL need not say that his feelings were committed on the success of the bill, and how anxious he was that no needless delay should take place before it was discussed. He would not, however, object to the recommendation of the honourable gentleman (Mr. Miles), for he understood that the request for further delay was bond fide made for purposes of consideration. He admitted that a great change was likely to be effected by his measures, and he was desirous that the measures should have due deliberation; but he begged to state, as far as the Government were concerned, that when the measure was brought on it would be proceeded with de die in diem. At the hon. member's suggestion, he would name next Monday week for the discussion. (Hear.) With respect to the other questions put by the hon. member for the University of Oxford, he would remark that the calculation of loss of revenue on the reduction of duties on the raw material had been most disappointing, that he felt reluctant to state the amount at which he estimated the probable loss to the revenue from the contemplated changes. In the recent reductions, he had anticipated a loss to the Excise of about a million, and to the Customs of about four millions; but the actual loss by the reduction of protective duties had been more rapidly supplied than could possibly have been expected. The fact was shown to be that the absolute reduction of the protective duties had not been so much as could be wished. It was very difficult to form any estimate of the loss likely to occur from the taking off the duty on articles which contributed to the revenue. To the other question he could not give a direct answer, but he believed the charge on the Consolidated Fund would be about £530,000

Lord J. RUSSELL did not object to a proper time being given for consideration before the discussion took place. He wished, however, to understand whether the course of the discussion would be to take the Corn question first, and to proceed with the other reductions afterwards?

Sir R. PEEL answered, that all he could say on that head was, that whatever course could be suggested as best calculated to enable the House to pronounce an opinion on the principle of his measure would be the course the most acceptable to him. If it were considered advisable to take the question of the Corn-laws first, so as to give honourable members who held different views to those involved in the proposition, an opportunity to express their sentiments, he could take the Government consent, but from the period when the right hon. Baronet left office in 1830. Ever since that time he had given the right hon. Baronet his unqualified support; and never since that time had he opposed, or cause to oppose, (Hear, hear.) He had supported the changes introduced into the Corn-law, for he was aware the agricultural interest could well afford some relaxation of the protection it then enjoyed. He had supported the right hon. Baronet's proposition to admit Canada Corn duty free, which raised the question as to the admission of foreign cattle; and he had with more confidence supported the right hon. Baronet on the Canada Corn Bill. In all those changes as (Mr. Liddell) had stated, he had view the principle of protection to British industry and British interests. (Hear, hear.) To the very last moment he had continued the confidence which hitherto he had placed in her Majesty's Government. He had, in spite of all the solicitations, declined to take part in a meeting which had lately been called in his own county, and at which a noble Duke (Cleveland), a personal friend of his own, had assisted. But after hearing the speech of the noble Lord who moved the Address (Lord F. Egerton) after hearing the speech of the right hon. Baronet, in which the argument in favour of the principles of protection was abandoned as no longer tenable—he felt that the period had arrived when he could no longer retain such hope or confidence in the measures of the right hon. Baronet. (Hear, hear.) He would briefly address the measure before him to take a course which was painful to his own feelings, but which was the only course he would follow consistent with honour and justice to himself. He fully admitted that the very first question which ought to occupy the attention of every honest member of this country, was how the poor were to be fed; and a subject of the principles advocated was quite consistent with the consideration of that important question. The right hon. Baronet made a distinction between the policy of protection and the justice of continuing it to the agricultural interest. The policy of protection, the right hon. Baronet had declared he could no longer undertake to defend; that he could no longer conscientiously resist the annual motion of the hon. member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. Villiers); that protection to agriculture could only be defended on the ground of exclusive burdens on land, and that they admitted of adjustment or compensation. Now, as to the policy of protection, it was most necessary to provide for the maintenance of the poor, and with that provision the policy of protection might still be defended; he asserted that by protection the poor had been provided for a long series of years with a cheap and abundant supply of food; upon those very grounds protection had hitherto been defended by the right hon. Baronet himself, and upon those very grounds it might be defended at the present moment. (Hear, hear.) During those years of plenty, the country had been visited by apprehensions of scarcity even more formidable than that arising from the failure of the potato crop. When a supply of corn had been required from abroad, it had always been obtained by importation, and there was no reason to apprehend that the same supply would not be obtained if it were again needed. As to the policy of protection, let them look again at the improvement that had taken place in agriculture and in cattle. Upon what faith had such an amount of capital been invested in the cultivation of the soil? Who were those who would suffer the first and in the greatest degree from any great change in the range of prices that had hitherto been enabled to realise? But he would not be content with stating his own opinions on this subject; he would cite those of the right hon. Baronet himself, expressed in the speech in which he proposed his plan of 1842

The protection which I propose to retain, I do not retain for the especial protection of any particular class. Protection cannot be vindicated on that principle. The only protection which can be vindicated, is that protection which is considered with the general welfare of the country in view, and, above the belief of my colleagues is, that it is important for this country, that it is of the highest importance to the welfare of all classes in this country, that you should maintain as large a portion as possible of your supply of food from your own domestic agriculture; while we also feel, that any additional price which you may pay in effecting that object is an additional price, which can not be vindicated as a bounty or protection to agriculture, but only on the ground of its being advantageous to the country at large.

With those principles he cordially concurred; those were the grounds upon which he (Mr. Liddell) advocated protection, and he could not say, after all he had heard from the right hon. Baronet, that he found any reason for changing those principles (Hear, hear.) What had occurred to produce the sudden and somewhat unexpected change in the opinions of the right hon. Baronet? One cause he had stated to be the experience of the success that attended his former relaxation of the restrictions of commerce; but another cause which had somewhat precipitated his views, he stated to be the failure of the potato crop in Ireland, and in England. He assured the right hon. Baronet he addressed him in no spirit of irritation; it was with some feelings of disappointment indeed, but none of anger. But he could not help thanking that the law as it stood furnished a sufficient guarantee against any apprehensions of the consequences of that failure, and that the remedies the right hon. Baronet proposed to supply, were, in point of fact, no remedies at all. The starving cotter of Ireland, who depended for subsistence on his half or quarter acre of land, could not be benefited in any conceivable degree by opening the ports. If £100,000 or £200,000 could be sent to Ireland, if employment were given on public works, if money was put in the pockets of the people at the same time that measures were taken to lessen the price of food, then the poor of that country might be benefitted; but how they could benefit from the measures of the right hon. Baronet, he could not see. This country had often been called on to furnish relief to Ireland in periods of scarcity, and similar measures might now have been adopted, with better prospects of success, and less dissatisfaction, than would attend the present policy. He admitted the great ability which marked the right hon. Baronet's statement; but he could not go with him to the full extent of his opinions. Surely, the right hon. Baronet could not intend to assert that at the present prosperity of the country was caused by the relaxations of 1842; other causes, operating concurrently with those relaxations, had produced the present unexampled demand for labour; and to these causes combined the present prosperity must be attributed. As the right hon. Baronet, when he referred to a different policy, while defending the principles of the reform of 1843, did not admit that it was occasioned by the Corn-laws alone, but asserted that the commercial depression arose from other causes also, so he (Mr. Liddell) stated, that the present unexampled prosperity was not the result of the relaxations of protection alone, but was also due to circumstances concurrent with that relaxation That prosperity was greater than any former period; wages were high, and the prices of provisions so moderate that the [illegible] classes enjoyed more of the comforts, conveniences, and even the luxuries of life, than at any former period, either in this country or in any other. He assented under the system of protection which it was now sought to destroy! He could show that the prices of grain in the markets, at the present time, indicated no apprehensions of scarcity; indeed, the average of six weeks ending the 17th of January, 1846, wheat stood at 36s. 8 per quarter—exactly the medium between 34s. and 38s., which, the right hon. Baronet, when he modified the Tariff, . . days the reasonable price of the grower, and one that would secure a . . . supply to the consumer. And, with this fair and reasonable price of corn, were they to be frightened with visions of scarcity which the markets did not realise? On these grounds, he could not agree with the right hon. Baronet that the system of protection under which corn . . . had flourished under which capital had been expended upon the cultivation of the land, and upon the maintenance of which the best interests of the country depended? The right hon. Baronet had given them his plans of the effects to be produced by his changes: he would permit him (Mr. Liddell) to express his fears of them. Within the last five or six years, unbounded improvement had taken place in the cultivation of the land in the North of England: miles and miles of drainage had been laid down; in these improvements the capital of the tenant had been spent as well as that of the landowner, and they were the very last things which the principle of protection were no longer acted on? He stated his fears were visionary; he fervently wished the right hon. Baronet's hopes would be realized; but should any material alteration in the price of corn follow these changes, if any extent of land should be thrown out of cultivation, those who would first suffer would not be the owners of large estates, who were denounced by the League as regardless of all interests but their own; but the small tenants, who had expended all their capital in the land, and those smaller landholders who cultivate their own estates, and who would not be able to compete with the improvements of their richer neighbours. He feared that . . . under of property to an extent little anticipated by the right hon. Baronet might be the consequence of this policy; and he for one would not expose himself to the reproaches of those who had placed confidence in him by the support of measures by which his constituents in any other light than that of a perfect honest and consistent man (Hear, hear). He could easily find excuses and abundant reasons for continuing to give the right hon. Baronet his support as before. He had only one objection to taking that course which was this—It would not be an honest one; and, believing the right hon. Baronet to have too much manliness and sincerity of character not to feel that if he would only give him the consent that it was the result of a complete revolution change in his convictions, so he must give equal credit for sincerity to those who were under the necessity of telling him that their convictions were still the same, and that they adhered to the principles they formerly expressed. In spite of all the disadvantages they might incur by keeping them: and if that change now proposed, were to be accepted, it was both possible and probable that it might be attended by great difficulties in the way of those interests of the community the particular interests of whom he (Mr. Liddell) had been delegated to support. It might especially, so far as he was yet enabled to decide, effect to a very considerable extent the . . . of small tenants, who had expended all their capital in the land; it would be allowed, were not, generally, an overpaid body. (Hear, hear.) . . . performed onerous duties in that manner, with that sacrifice of personal comfort and time which was the inevitable consequence of their change which demanded and received the warm and grateful approbation of the community; and the change then unfolded, it was certain, would be to them doubly injurious, because it was so totally unexpected. This was, in fact, a very strong argument against the present measure; but still stronger reasons why that measure should be rejected were, of the evil effects it must inevitably have upon our own grown crops, of the improvement that would take place in the demand for labour, of the change in labourmarket effects which, it would be seen by all, would place at the disposal of the great manufacturing interests a greater amount of labour, at a cheaper rate than had ever before been experienced by them. (Hear, hear.) From that would result a greater burden upon the agriculturists, in the shape of increased Poor-rates; and it was upon this account, combined with the many other reasons to which he had alluded, mostly apparent to all, that he had felt it his duty to stand up in his place in Parliament, and before the right hon. Baronet, record his conscientious and confirmed objections to the plan which had, that night, been laid before the House. As to the species of compensation which had been offered to those whose interests were now in jeopardy, he (Mr. Liddell) had little doubt that, in bringing forward his long list of arguments, they which had been put forward with usual judgment and ability, and that, of these, there were many which were beneficial, and many which would prove satisfactory. More particularly would the House concur in the expediency of placing, as was offered to be done, the whole of our Colonial possessions on the same footing with regard to the Corn-laws, as Canada. He (Mr. Liddell) considered the Canada Corn-bill a measure of far-seeing policy; and, so far from having looked for the passing of that bill as a narrowing of the principles of protection, he had ever viewed it as an extension of protection an extension of the system to the remotest portion of our possessions; and he was, therefore, glad to find that the policy which had been established was about to be applied to the other colonies. It was a policy which affected not the colonies alone, but the very seas which connected the colonies with the mother country —a system from which our commercial marine derived the very greatest benefit. It was likewise a policy from which the shipping interest had already derived, and would still further derive, advantage; for there followed, upon its adoption, an additional demand for the building of ships, and the employment of those ships already afloat; and the best proof that such was the fact and not an assertion, was to be found in the immensely improved state of the shipping interest since 1826. For that portion of the measure of the right hon. Baronet which related to the reduction of duties on timber, he had ever viewed it as one of extreme hardship and injustice; and he could not see either the necessity or the justification of that total [illegible] in the existing

Corn-law which was proposed (Hear, hear.) The value of that species of compensation intended to be obtained by an alteration in the highway rates, he was unable to discover; and he could not but be of opinion, from experience and experiment, that to interfere, in the way suggested with the appointment of local district surveyors, would prove both imprecicable and injurious. He further thought that the advance of loans, on public credit, for agricultural improvements, would be dangerous. He could not see in what way the parties whose property was to be improved could be benefitted, for if they could afford to repay the sums advanced, why could they not obtain that sum in the ordinary way, the way in which, when they were desirous of so doing, they always did raise money? (Hear, hear.) He should not enter into a particular discussion at any further length, he might state that it was his decided conviction, that before the House sanctioned or opposed the measure now submitted to them, the country should be appealed to (hear, hear.) A question of such great, such paramount importance to the landed interest, ought to receive the deliberate consideration of the country, and the country ought deliberately to express its wishes, and its decision, before Parliament came to any decision. He (Mr. Liddell) knew, that in the event of a general election he could not offer his support to any popular outcry; that he would feel himself called upon to oppose the principles which had been so long and so zealously advocated by the members of the Anti Corn-law League; and that, therefore, he might look for resistance, and perhaps would have to antagonise ejectment, in that Borough which he had the honour to represent. He was well aware that a noble Lord, occupying the eminent position of Lord Lieutenant of that county, had not thought it inconsistent with his dignity in Parliament, and his place in the country, to write a speech against the Anti-Corn-law Ball in the face of his constituents, and in behalf of that side to which the noble Lord gave in his adhesion; but, without any reference to what might be the result of his again presenting himself to his constituents, before whom all the difficulties he would have, in so presenting himself, to encounter, he would not, for the purposes of obtaining popular favour, stoop to the advocacy of principles and a policy the very opposite of those which he had on another occasion been sent to Parliament to support, and in defiance of which alone he had been asked for his seat. (Cheers.)

Captain Rous said, that when the right honourable Baronet was surrounded by such questionable friends when in the neighbourhood of gentlemen who had not yet made up their minds as to which side of the house they would honour with their notice—might not be unreasonable for those gentlemen to demand that he would support him, and the measures he proposed heart and soul; and he would do so, because he was satisfied they were measures for the welfare of every class of Her Majesty's subjects. (Cheers.) (Hear, hear, from the opposition benches.) On many occasions he had opposed the right hon. Baronet, but in the general scheme of his policy he had almost invariably concurred: and what was now submitted to the consideration of the House, he could most cordially approve. There had been instances recently when hon. gentlemen behind him (Captain Rous) have backed first into the gallery and then into another, when alterations or improvements of the working of the laws connected with it have been proposed; and what he particularly referred to was when last year a proposition had been brought forward to admit Australian corn on the same terms, and subject to the same taxes as Canadian corn. Although there was then not a single gentleman or an attempt at an argument, introduced by one among the seconders, who went over to the other gallery, and, without pretext or reason, voted against the measure. He rose in opposition to many of his old friends and to some of his relatives, but he did so conscientiously, and in despite of the wealth which he had reason to apprehend would not be beneficial to his own interests. When he at first heard of the failure of the potato crop in Ireland, and in several parts of England, his expectation had been and, unfortunately, it had to a great extent been realised - that a fortnight's continuance of rain would destroy, at the very least, one-fourth of the wheat crop; and, under such circumstances, it was apparent to him, as it had been apparent to every man who had reflected upon the subject, that something ought to be done which, in extent and principle, should meet, adequately, the occasion. The argument which he had to use in defence of the course he was now taking, and of the opinions he had now expressed, was an incontrovertible one: it was, that as the population of this country was increasing at an incalculable ratio, it stood to reason that it must supply of food for that population was restricted to a certain area, the supply which was stationary must eventually become inadequate to the increased demand. He had no fear of anything taking place like 2,000,000 of acres being thrown out of cultivation, for he was satisfied that, as a matter of necessity, there must be aware, that so long as there was a labourer in the parish, and Labourers there always would be, the land would never be left uncultivated. It could not be expected, however, that he (Captain Rous) should, in the present state of the subject; but as he had seen hon. members on all sides of him, who had come to the House ready primed with a speech, before they knew, or could know, upon what they were to speak, or what was the measure they had determined to oppose (laughter); when he saw those hon. gentlemen, and heard them declare that they would use all their efforts and all their skill to defeat that measure, whether suitable or not - he should not be doing his duty as a man and a Member of this House, if he had not stood up, and used every constitutional means in his power, to secure to the proposition of the right hon. Baronet a full and fair hearing. (Cheers.) The hon. and gallant gentleman thought the observations he had close by saying, that in the event of the right hon. Baronet failing in his plans, of a dissolution of Parliament, and of the noble Lord, the member for London, becoming Prime Minister, (Captain Rous) was resigned to a certain thing, the supply which was stationary must eventually become inadequate to the increased demand. He had no fear of anything taking place like 2,000,000 of acres being thrown out of cultivation, for he was satisfied that, as a matter of necessity, there [illegible] on the land, and if the country was to be supplied with food, there must be aware, that so long as there was a labourer in the parish, and Labourers there always would be, the land would never be left uncultivated. It could not be expected, however, that he (Captain Rous) should, in the present state of the subject; but as he had seen hon. members on all sides of him, who had come to the House ready primed with a speech, before they knew, or could know, upon what they were to speak, or what was the measure they had determined to oppose (laughter); when he saw those hon. gentlemen, and heard them declare that they would use all their efforts and all their skill to defeat that measure, whether suitable or not - he should not be doing his duty as a man and a Member of this House, if he had not stood up, and used every constitutional means in his power, to secure to the proposition of the right hon. Baronet a full and fair hearing. (Cheers.) The hon. and gallant gentleman thought the observations he had close by saying, that in the event of the right hon. Baronet failing in his plans, of a dissolution of Parliament, and of the noble Lord, the member for London, becoming Prime Minister, (Captain Rous) was resigned to a certain thing, the supply [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] indeed would have been a boon to the labours of population. Protection for the beverages of the poor man he did expect they would have had, and that that would have been part of the right hon. Baronet's scheme, but in that he was truly disappointed. (Hear.)

M. B. ESCOTT rose to express his extreme thankfulness to the right hon. Baronet for having embodied in his measure a remission of the duties on Indian corn. He (Mr. Escott) had given notice of a measure having that object last year. His impression was undoubtedly that there was no measure more calculated to benefit both the farmer and the farm labourer.

MR. WAKLEY had expected that the gentlemen of the Anti Corn-law League would have expressed their satisfaction at the proposition of the right hon. Baronet, and he was astonished at the stubborn silence which they had preserved; because it was impossible they could have heard the scheme of the right hon. Baronet without expressing the strongest approbation, and to the most prudent part of his proposal agreeing with him. There might be some points of disagreement, and some arrangements which might call for discussion from them; but when they heard that in the end of three years there was to be a total repeal of the Corn-law, and a previous repeal with reference to the duties on the food of the people, it was utterly impossible that they could fail to express the strongest approval of the scheme as a whole. The honourable [illegible] But he (Mr. Wakley), was firmly persuaded that the right honourable Baronet's measure was one calculated to benefit the millions, to benefit trade, and to preserve the peace of the metropolis—that he felt for the scheme of the right hon. Baronet, the strongest possible favour. He firmly believed that no proposition was ever made to Parliament, as a whole, more calculated to tend to the improvement of the condition of the people of this country. Did the hon. Member for South Wiltshire think it nothing to propose a measure calculated to reduce the price of bread and meat? But if the proposition had been made with regard to the malt-tax, would it then have obtained the support of the hon. Member for Wiltshire to the other parts of the right hon. Baronet's scheme? He (Mr. Wakley) clearly saw that the next fortnight was to be expounding, agitation, and not very peaceful agitation. He saw clearly enough that an appeal was to be made to the passions of the electors of this country. He wished hon Members to bear in mind the circumstances under which it would be made. He wished them to remember one fact with reference to the circumstances of the country, and to bear in mind that, if they did excite the passions of the agricultural electors, their agitation would extend not only to the most remote parts of the kingdom, but also to the cities and towns. He would beg of them to remember that there were hundreds of thousands of people in this country who were the consumers of food, and not the sellers of it, and who had no votes at election. He would wish to ask them, if they were prepared, for a rise every hustings in the kingdom as an instrument of torture to the eyes of the poor man who had not a vote? Let them remember that they were going to make an appeal of a most dangerous character. The poor man would say, "See what happens: the parties who return the Members are the sellers of food; we are the consumers of food; they have the votes, and we have none." Did they believe that, if an appeal of that kind were made, it could do otherwise than cause agitation, and be attended with danger to the peace of society? Millions who had no votes complained of class legislation, and said that they had no voice in electing those who were to govern the country, and they were about to call on the sellers of food to determine whether the consumers of food should have justice done to them with regard to commercial legislation. He stated this because he was convinced that if the appeal were made, and if strong excitement were raised by it, it would be of a most dangerous character, and calculated to endanger the peace of society. If hon. gentlemen were sincere in reference to the feelings of the masses of the people of the metropolis, he should think that the mass of society would be opposed to the scheme of the right hon. Baronet, he would ask were they prepared to extend the franchise to the consumers of food? No, they were not; and he therefore said, under these circumstances, they would act wisely to be cautious how they excited the indignation of the millions, and induced them to believe that they were the promoters of oppression. Believing, as he did, that the scheme of the right hon. Baronet had been propounded with a sincere desire to benefit the nation at large, and with reference to no particular classes—believing that it was one of a just character—believing that there was nothing of injustice to any party in the scheme, he should, in his most cordial support; and if the right hon. Baronet maintained the noble ground he had taken, the millions of England would carry his proposition for him, if appended to.

MR. BENETT said, he came to that House free and unpledged. He had pursued an honest course for 40 years in public and in private, and nothing should induce him to do anything which he did not believe to be for the benefit of the country. The hon. member for Finsbury talked of agitation; had he never been a demagogue in a village? But the agitation might be worse than the evil complained of by the agricultural labourers. At Godalming, for instance, there were 200 people, as stated by a reporter, a tallow-maker, who earned about 30s. a week, and another person like him. The speeches delivered by them were made for the purpose, and had been since proved and stated in the county paper. He could assure the member for the farmers were not persons to agitate; they were deeply offended; but they had not the skill to agitate, and they really did not like agitation; nor were they agitators who would produce mischief.

MR. GLADSTONE denied that the Anti Corn-[illegible] ed the announcement of the right hon. Baronet with stubborn silence. They had expressed the slightest disrespect to the measure of the right hon. gentleman; but on so occasion a measure nobody should be called upon hastily to express an opinion. He had left the hon. gentleman who had just sat down in possession of the field contended for, and had conceded to them, a forlight's time, that they were not that night going to raise a debate, and he had merely returned out of curiosity to hear what was going on. He had no authority to speak for the League, but he must say that its supporters could not [illegible] cause of any stubbornness for discarding from so important a statement [illegible]

MR. NEWDEGATE did he had limited himself to a question of deep importance which he had put to the right hon. Baronet. He could not, however, pass over the statement of the hon. member for Finsbury. Why had he made a powerful appeal against the danger of inflaming the passions of the working classes, if he did not know the gentlemen on his (Mr. Newdegate's) side of the house excited their feelings? He had forgotten that it was then the gentlemen and yeomanry of England who mainly contributed to preserve the peace of the country from the agitation created by the Anti-Corn-Law League? He had forgotten that he (Mr. Newdegate) had stated this out of the house, and that he had been attacked in the House of Parliament on the same night for making that statement? Had he forgotten that he (Mr. Newdegate) had produced evidence to prove that it was the Anti Corn Law League which was exciting the people? and could he forget the fact that it was the agriculturists who then saved the country? Perhaps her Majesty's Government could [illegible] with that cordial support which they [illegible] by the right hon. Baronet? Were they to be told that the agriculturists knew nothing of his measure in the country? Were they unable to form an independent judgment? And if not, were they not to consult with their fellow-countrymen? The country was then in that unfortunate and conculcated gave good reason for them to consult about it. He thought they were justified in claiming to consult on the proposal of the right hon. Baronet. The hon. member for Finsbury appeared to anticipate the measure, that it seemed as if he was afraid that the country should be enabled to express an opinion on the subject. He considered that, when a Minister had cast aside the experience of a long life, and was prepared to act upon the experience of four years, during which the policy he advocated had not been carried out, the least they could expect was a time for the consideration of the proposal when had been submitted to them to-night. He thought that if the views of the right honourable Baronet (Sir R. Peel) had undergone so complete a change, he would best consult the convenience of the House, by allowing ample opportunity for the expression of public opinion on this question. He (Mr. Newdegate) that the noble Lord opposite, in producing his letters, had paid the first installment of that debt of gratitude which his Sovereign, of a once unavenging with whom he (Mr Newdegate) acted were about to stir the passions of the people on this question. He must say that he considered that observation did not come with very good grace from the hon. member for Finsbury. If that hon. gentleman had challenged hon. members on that side to extend the suffrage; and he would say, that if the people of England were exposed to the oppressive effects of foreign competition, and to the heavy burdens to which they were now subject, it might be necessary seriously to consider the propriety of extending the suffrage much lower than it was at present, and he did not shrink from expressing such an opinion.

MR. WAKLEY said, that the hon. gentleman seemed, from some of his observations, to suppose that he (Mr. Wakley) was one of the Anti-Corn-Law League, advocates. He assured the hon. member that he did only attend the meetings, and that a parish meeting, on the subject of the Corn-laws. He hoped this statement would not be deemed offensive by hon. members connected with the Anti-Corn-Law League, for he was deeply sensible of the great services they had rendered to the country.

MR. NEWDEGATE explained.

Colonel T. WOOD said he believed the proposition of the right hon. Baronet, the First Lord of the Treasury, would have a tendency to remove from the arena of politics a question which now divided the two great interests of the country, and agricultural and manufacturing classes, whose interests he felt only identical. He therefore felt it his duty to give his cordial and hearty support to the propositions of the right hon. Baronet, who, he believed, was actuated by the most patriotic motives. He would, at all hazards, give the right hon. gentleman his most hearty and unqualified support.

Lord NEWPORT said, he considered that those hon. members who intended to support the policy enunciated by the right hon. Baronet (Sir R. Peel) to-night, contrary to their own conscientious convictions, and the actual or implied pledges they had given to their constituents, would be guilty of a great dereliction of duty. With reference to one remark which had been made, he would observe that no other appeal than a constitutional appeal to the country was contemplated by those hon. gentlemen who entertained similar opinions with himself. (Hear, hear.) He must say, that he did not think the right hon. Baronet was justified in bringing forward such a measure as he had propounded that night without appealing to the country, and taking the sense of the constituencies on the question.

MR. AGLIONBY regretted that this subject had been treated as a class question. Some hon. gentlemen on the other side spoke as if they were the only persons who cared for the agricultural interest; but since the propriety of abolishing the Corn-laws was mooted in 1832 he had known many hon. members who were not only unconnected with commerce or manufactures, but who derived their subsistence entirely from landed property, who were the strenuous and consistent advocates of a repeal of those laws. He believed that the gentlemen connected with the Anti-Corn-law League had, by reason and argument, made many converts to the same opinions, even among the country constituencies; and he believed that, a few years hence, the conduct of those gentlemen would receive the approbation of the right hon. Baronet on that subject, and honourable gentlemen on this side great step in the course which the right honourable Baronet (Sir R. Peel) had treated this as a class question, he should have felt it his duty to oppose his proposition; but regarding the measure of the right hon. gentleman as one great step in the course which the right honourable believed it was essential to pursue, in order to promote the best interests of the country, he begged to tender the [illegible] thanks, and he believed a similar feeling would be entertained by a large majority of the people, even in the agricultural districts. He (Mr. Aglionby) had always advocated a repeal of the Malt-tax; but, under existing circumstances, it might be premature to ask the right hon. Baronet to consider that subject, and he would not do so. He would, however, venture to express a hope that before many years elapsed that tax might be repealed, for he believed such a step would be most beneficial to the labouring classes. He would only add, that he cordially approved of the general scope of the right hon. Baronet's measure, so far as he was able to judge of it, though, without further consideration, he would not pledge himself on all its details.

MR. G. BANKES said, it [illegible] hear the result of an appeal [illegible] the Anti-Corn-Law League [illegible] question which must be decided by the feeling of the country. Then, why not take the only legitimate means of ascertaining what the feeling of the country was? He would say to those gentlemen who opposed the right hon. Baronet's measure, that the result of an appeal to the constituencies—"Join with us in facilitating that appeal, which we are most desirous of making, and by the issue of which we are content to abide." His right honourable friend (Sir Robert Peel) for, when he had stated the grounds on which the right honourable gentleman had acceded to his observations the other night, he thought he was justified in using that term had said that he would not [illegible] that the scheme gave a [illegible] to the landed interests of the country. In (Mr. Bankes) would ask what provision was made in the scheme for maintaining the interests of the farmers in general, and, above all, of the Britis[illegible] The compensation offered to them was [illegible] relief to [illegible] the payment of a portion of the medical officers.

What relief did the right hon. Baronet suppose [illegible] such a measure as this? The hon. gentleman had said that those who approved of this bill were not confined to the mercantile classes, but they included many landowners. And why? Because [illegible] would not be subject to the agricultural interest represented by the landowners—the tenant-farmers. A great landowner might exist, and even receive large returns from his property, without any tenants at all. By employing bailiffs, who were much cheaper than tenants, he would obtain the same return that he received now; but the effect would be [illegible] the whole class of tenant-farmers would be swept away. He contended that no relief to the right hon. Baronet proposed to afford to the tenant-farmers as a compensation for the injury which it was acknowledged, would be inflicted upon that class by the proposed measure, was very trifling indeed. He found from a return which he held in his hand, that the half yearly expenses of criminal prosecutions in the county of Dorset was £377 0s. 9d. And this was one of the burdens from which the tenant farmers were to be relieved. Speaking that it were desirable that the trifling relief proposed should be given, still the agricultural interest had a right to complain that it was introduced into it upon a vast measure as the present. It was called a compromise and a compromise. These were terms which the agricultural interest regarded [illegible] only defended protection because they believed it to be consistent with the welfare of the country, and not because they looked upon it as a class right. The assumption was being increased, not for the security to their own fields, but to protect the Oregon territory, and the sources of commercial prosperity, in which he admitted the agriculturists felt as much interest as the manufacturing part of the community; and if the manufacturers knew their own interest they would see that it consisted in preserving that national industry which brought the agriculturists as customers to them in the home markets (Hear, hear.) It might be right to change the Poor Laws which were notoriously defective, to place the expenses of the highways and criminal prosecutions under a better arrangement; but, to mix them up with a measure of this kind was, however unintentional, something like a deception to the agricultural interest, as if they were to be compensated by so petty a consideration. If they were to be deprived of protection, let it be on known and intelligible grounds, and he complained that the right hon. Baronet introduced mere peculiarities not fairly stating the agriculturists were faced in an invidious manner before the public. Again, [illegible] adopting the words of the right hon friend, "This is a question which must be settled by the voice of the nation," and, as that voice was not heard [illegible] that house, in reference to this question, he could [illegible]

MR CREEKE (the Chairman of the Committee) then reported progress, and it was moved and agreed to, that the House resolve [illegible] Committee, on Monday, the 9th of February.

The House adjourned at 1 o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS. The LORD CHANCELLOR [illegible] had received her Majesty's most gracious reply to the Address, as follows:—"I receive with satisfaction your loyal and dutiful Address, and rely with confidence on your constant desire [illegible] happiness of my people."

THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON'S EXPLANATION.

After reading some questions from the Duke of Richmond, the Duke of WELLINGTON rose for the purpose of giving an explanation of the course he had adopted before and after the late Ministerial crisis. He said—My friends when they left office [illegible] were recalled from Ireland, and from [illegible] of great Britain, on the state of the potato crops, in the course of last autumn, and of the inconvenience likely to result from that state in different parts of the country, my right hon. friend at the head of her Majesty's Government considered it his duty to call together his colleagues, in order to consider of the reports which were sent to him. Accordingly, he did so; he had those reports before his colleagues, and made to them certain propositions for the adoption of measures which he considered it necessary that her Majesty's Government should adopt either to avoid or to limit the evils likely, in his opinion, to occur in the [illegible] of these misfortunes. One of the measures [illegible] by my right hon. friend was, that her Majesty's government should recommend to her Majesty an Order in Council to suspend the operation of the existing Corn-law, so as to open the ports for the admission of corn duty free. My Lords, it is not necessary that I should discuss the question, or state, on the grounds upon which this recommendation was founded; but, however, I was one of those who considered this measure not necessary to be adopted at that time. I considered that the misfortune that had occurred, and was likely to occur, had the effect of depriving us, it may say, of a large part of the provision made for their food for the year—that the [illegible] was not [illegible] a deficiency of food. Millions, it is true, had been deprived of their food, but still there was no deficiency of food, according to all accounts no deficiency of food in the country. That which was required, in my opinion, was, that arrangements should be made, as had been made heretofore, for finding the means of transport for the quantity of food which was required, and made to them certain propositions for the adoption of measures which he considered it [illegible] my right hon. friend was, that her Majesty's government should recommend to her Majesty an Order in Council to suspend the operation of the existing Corn-law, so as to open the ports for the admission of corn duty free. My Lords, it is not necessary that I should discuss the question, or state, on the grounds upon which this recommendation was founded; but, however, I was one of those who considered this measure not necessary to be adopted at that time. I considered that the misfortune that had occurred, and was likely to occur, had the effect of depriving us, it may say, of a large part of the provision made for their food for the year—that the [illegible] was not [illegible] a deficiency of food. Millions, it is true, had been deprived of their food, but still there was no deficiency of food, according to all accounts no deficiency of food in the country. That which was required, in my opinion, was, that arrangements should be made, as had been made heretofore, for finding the means of transport for the quantity of food which was required, in whatever part of the country it might be wanted, and made to their employment, and giving them food. (Hear, hear.) It did not appear to me that the provisions of the existing Corn-law [illegible] it was desirable that the ports should be opened, the provisions of that law [illegible] did provide for that measure. ("Hear, hear," from the Duke of Richmond.) As soon as ever the press of any particular article [illegible] such a measure, upon that ground, I was one of those who objected to that proposition. At the same time, and I was most anxious for it, the Government unanimously proposed to adopt all the measures of reform in the Corn-law. Many members of the Cabinet objected to the suggested alterations, and there was a strong difference of opinion upon the subject. As for my part, my Lords, I certainly was of opinion that it was desirable [illegible] to the Corn-law; but, my Lords, I confess that, in my individual position, I considered an union of opinion in the Cabinet as essential to the safety of the Government itself. Having served England now for about fifty years, in high public stations, I consider it my duty, upon all occasions, to endeavour to promote its service; and I did everything in my power to reconcile the differences of opinion among my colleagues, and to preserve in union a Government which enjoyed the confidence of the Sovereign, of the public, which has served the public so steadily, and enjoyed the confidence of both Houses of Parliament. I considered it my duty to make every effort to preserve union in the Cabinet, to reconcile differences of opinion, as the best service I could render to the Government, in the circumstances in which I was placed, and in which the Cabinet was [illegible] upon this subject. My Lords, unfortunately, in these efforts I did not succeed, and the result was, a determination upon the part of my right honourable friend that he would submit to her Majesty the resignation of his office, and that he would recommend to her Majesty to endeavour to form another Government. My Lords, this course was adopted after a discussion whether it was most advisable that he should come down to Parliament, and make his proposition for an alteration in the Corn-law, having a divided Cabinet, in which the majority were against the proposition, or whether it was not best, and most for the interest and convenience of her Majesty, that he should proceed at once, and intimate to her the position in which he stood, and express his desire that her Majesty would permit him to resign his office, and that her Majesty would form another Government. That course was discussed. I certainly was one who thought it desirable he should resign his office before going to Parliament with a divided Cabinet. I believe all the Cabinet were of the same opinion. I was of that opinion, and I know others were; and accordingly my right honourable friend took that course; he waited upon her Majesty, informed her of the situation in which he found himself, and recommended to her Majesty to form another Administration. Her Majesty sent for a noble Lord, and what the noble Lord understand. Indeed I know did make an endeavour to form an Administration [illegible] unfortunately did not succeed. Her Majesty then thought proper to write to my right honourable friend, to desire him to resume his situation, which he still held, until another Administration was formed. My right honourable friend wrote to me; I was in the country at the time—and informed me he had been sent for, and that her Majesty having stated her intention to resume his situation, he had determined, happen what might, if alone, he would consider her Majesty's wishes. I believe all the Cabinet were of the same opinion. I was of that opinion, and I know others were; and accordingly my right honourable friend took that course; he waited upon her Majesty, informed her of the situation in which he found himself, and recommended to her Majesty to form another Administration. Her Majesty sent for a noble Lord, and what the

LEGISLATION UPON RAILWAYS

Sir R. PEEL moved for a Select Committee to consider the mode in which the House should deal with the railway bills proposed to be submitted to the House during the present session. He said:—Her Majesty's Government has felt it to be their duty to avail themselves of the earliest opportunity of calling the attention of the House to the number of railway plans which will probably be brought under the consideration of the House, and to the best mode of dealing in the present session with that great quantity of railway business. (Hear, hear.) The attention of the Government has been for some time past given to this subject; and they have collected all the information respecting it which they think likely to be advantageous to the House; but they have felt it to be their duty, in a matter affecting so many private interests, to apply to the authority of this House, or at least to a Committee of the House, for the sanction of any proceedings to be adopted, rather than to bring onward on their own views any particular plan to meet the serious difficulties which must accompany railway legislation in the present session. (Hear, hear.) As the organ of the Government, it becomes my present session. (Hear, hear.) As the organ of the Government, it becomes my duty to propose to-day the appointment of a Select Committee to consider this subject; but, as I said before, her Majesty's Government is prepared immediately to lay before the Committee all that information which will enable it satisfactorily to determine the course which ought to be pursued. In the first instance, I will call the attention of the House to the number of railway bills passed in the last two years, and to the amount of capital which may be raised under them. In the year 1844, forty-eight railway bills received the sanction of the Legislature, authorising a levy of capital to be expended on railways to the amount of about £14,780,000. In 1845, not less than 118 railway bills received the sanction of the House, and a capital, I believe, of about £50,000,000 was proposed to be raised under them. It is generally calculated that it will require three years for the completion of a railway. I believe that, with respect to railways in this part of the United Kingdom, the period calculated on an average as necessary for their completion was three years. If, therefore, there should have been sanctioned by legislative enactments, within the last two years, the levy of a sum of, I believe, nearly £70,000,000 for the execution of railway lines, it would follow, that in the year 1846, about £23,000,000 would have to be applied, under existing railway bills, for the construction of railways during that year. In 1847, a further sum of £33,500,000 would have to be applied; and in 1848 there would have to be applied about £18,000,000. I, of course, deduct, in the last year (in respect to the bills which received the sanction of Parliament in 1844), the portions of money already expended in their first year, and the remainder, therefore, is the complement of the sum of £70,000,000, which I consider to be authorised by railway legislation in the years 1844 and 1845. There can be no doubt that the sum of £23,500,000 to be applied, in the course of one year, to railway enterprises, is a very large sum, and would be a very large drain on the available capital of the kingdom. (Hear.) But I have also I have mentioned are those which have been actually sanctioned by railway enactments. (Hear.) We now approach the consideration of the number of railway schemes which may probably be brought under the consideration of Parliament in the course of the present year, and whatever proportion of these railway plans may receive the sanction of Parliament, of course there will be, whilst the railway business already sanctioned by Parliament are in course of execution, a still larger drain on the application of the capital of the country than I have stated (Hear.) The number of English railway plans which have been deposited at the Board of Trade at the time I now speak is 606, the number of Scotch railway plans so deposited is 124, and the number of Irish 88. There have been, therefore, deposited at the Board of Trade not less than 818 different railway plans. (Hear, hear.) Many of these, however, are rival schemes, and it may be calculated as improbable that Parliament will give its sanction to more than one of the competing lines. (Hear, hear.) In the case of several of them I believe that there is every reason to apprehend it to be probable that they cannot be proceeded with, either from non-compliance with the Standing Orders or from other causes. Nevertheless, it cannot be doubted that the number of railway plans which will be brought under the consideration of Parliament in the course of the present year will far exceed the number of railway schemes brought under its consideration at any former period. The number of railway schemes deposited at the Board of Trade involve the construction of 20,687 miles of new railway (hear, hear), and as far as a judgment can be formed from the public advertisements of the different companies, as well as from analogy, the total amount of expenditure contemplated by these railway schemes is not less than £350,000,000. (Hear, hear.) Making every deduction for those schemes which may not pass through the House, yet it is impossible that there can be any application of capital to such a scale, on what principle should that interference proceed? (Hear, hear.) I must say, in the first place, after making every deduction from the total amount of railway plans deposited at the Board of Trade (viz., 818), the contemplation of about 20,000 miles of new railway, I believe, that very scheme which will not stand before a Committee of this House on account of non-compliance with the Standing Orders, or which may fall from other causes. I think that there is a certain prospect of having such a number of plans to consider, that it will be almost utterly impossible for the House of Commons, consistently with the discharge of its other functions, to devote that proper consideration to them which they deserves. We know how severe was the pressure last year (Hear, hear.) I believe that in the present year it will be much greater. It ought be said that this alone would not be conclusive on this point, for if the House could not dispose of the business, it would be forced by necessity to consider the appointment of some other tribunal that could. (Hear, hear.) But I think that it is a grave question, whether or not we ought to permit or encourage so great an application of capital towards these railway schemes; whether or not that will be consistent with public advantage, and whether it will really conduce to the satisfactory carrying on of railway enterprises? (Hear, hear.) As I said before, I am willing to admit that the application of British capital to British railways in preference to foreign schemes is to be encouraged rather than otherwise; but is it advantageous to the promotion of sound railway enterprise, that such enormous capital should at once be applied to it? I doubt it even for the purpose of sound railway enterprise itself (Hear, hear, hear.) I believe it to be probable, in consequence of severe competition, that there will be a great increased demand for labour, and a rise in the price of the materials essential for the completion of railways. I believe that the estimate will be far exceeded, and that more money would be found to be utterly deficient. (Hear, hear.) If interference were proposed with respect to those railways plans which are about to be proceeded with under existing acts of Legislature, there might be grave objections to such a proceeding; but, with regard to [illegible] I should be for the public advantage to encourage to such an extent as to create a demand for labour, so great an application of capital to one species of industry and its consequent diversion from others. (Hear, hear.) But this, as I said before, is a matter which the Government feel had definitely better be settled by a Parliamentary decision, and that a Parliamentary Committee, composed of men whose opinions are entitled to the greatest weight and authority, should receive the information which the Government has collected, and consider any plan by which our future proceedings should be regulated. That is the course which the Government proposes, and this will be laid before the committee, showing the extent and direction of the lines. The [illegible] plans have been classified. All those which refer to the completion of existing lines of roads, for instance, where one line between the metropolis and a distant part of the country is now incomplete, from a part not being yet formed are classified under one head. Under another are classified the railways which appear to the Government to be suffered the greatest facilities to parts of the country which stand most in need of them. Another classification comprehended those lines which give facility for internal defence or coast lines, for instance. The [illegible] under the committee, on the appointment, much of the labour which they necessarily must have incurred of no previous preparation had been made. I trust, therefore, that the House will approve of the proposal with which I conclude. That a select committee should be appointed for the purpose of considering the mode in which the House shall deal with the railways proposed to be submitted to the House during the present Session." I abstain from entering into further questions which might arise out of the Standing Orders, &c.; because I trust that, by leaving the matter to the committee, reports may be made from time to time by which the decision of the House will be mainly guided. A desultory conversation ensued between several hon. members, some of whom stated objections to the committee, and others suggested the appointment of another tribunal to adjudicate upon the merits of railways. Mr. Hudson said, the proposal was for a committee to consider, and that immediately, what schemes ought to be submitted to Parliament, and finally resolve the sanction of the Legislature. First, however, the House ought to know whether the parties to the different schemes at the Board of Trade were prepared to proceed with their works, by making the necessary deposit of money; and, next, whether they would be able to pass through the Standing Orders Committee. If they were [illegible] them into execution. (Cheers.) The consequences would be [illegible] ready to be completed, and important to populous distr[illegible] particularly postponed. He would, therefore, suggest that, [illegible] [illegible] appointed, and some proposition [illegible] required for the execution of railways; for, it was to be recollected that the money was not to go out of the country. One-fifth of the expense of all railway undertakings would in the first instance go into the pockets of the landowner. Very likely he would re-invest it in the undertaking which went near his property, or he might lay it out in mortgage, or place it in the funds. Next, a considerable portion would pass into the hands of iron merchants and others supplying the materials of construction. Much had been said of late respecting distress in Ireland; but surely the best way of obviating it was to find employment for the labouring poor. (Hear.) The right honourable gentleman as he (Mr. Hudson) had gathered, proposed to limit the amount of capital; but who was to determine that limit? Among others he was interested in a railway in his own district, the East Riding of Yorkshire; he was a promoter of 70 miles of it, and the district was in great want of a means of communication in order to carry the produce to market, especially if the right honourable Baronet were about to expose the farmers to new competitors. (Cheers.) What right had any one to refuse the parties the power of making a railway? (Hear.) The landowners were consenting, and the money for the purpose was ready. He could not understand how or why any such power was to be given to a committee. (Hear, hear.) It was very well to reply that the committee was only to report. He had not been long a member, but he had seen enough to know that although no report of a committee was paramount, it was idle for any individual member to attempt to contend against it. The great question was, whether the proposed lines were of national importance or not, were they laid out in such a manner as to give the utmost advantages to the district? If they were, no doubt the money would be forthcoming for their execution. (Cheers.) Long before they came to the Standing Order Committee, long before the deposits were paid up, many schemes would be cut down, and the others, in the course even of three years, might be accomplished without danger to the currency of the country. Of course he meant if capital were not applied largely to other purposes—if people did not lay it out in South American Bonds or in the purchase of foreign corn, as was suggested to him. (Cheers and laughter.) He did not, indeed, wonder at some alarm for the derangement of the currency of the country, if there were to be large importations of foreign grain. (Cheers.) In that case capitalists must button up their pockets and patiently await the result. It was the duty of the House to apply itself carefully to the consideration of the measures in order that it might be competent to deal with them, and to deal with them in a satisfactory way. No doubt there were some lefters in the tribunals of the country. He had himself thought he had reason to complain of some of their decisions, but, upon more calm reflection, he had become convinced that they were honest, though they might not exactly suit his views. (Cheers.) He had, therefore, bowed with respect to the decisions of the House; and, as he was as largely interested in railways as most men, he was ready to abide by the ordinary tribunal. He had principally risen to suggest that, until the House knew the period when parties would be ready to proceed with their bills, it was useless for the committee to commence its inquiries. He was sure that many plans had been thrown into the Board of Trade with which it was never intended to proceed. Many others would be rejected; and, on the whole, he thought that, without adopting the course recommended by the right honourable Baronet, the House was in a condition, as last year, to transact the business before it with satisfaction to the parties and the public. Lord J. RUSSELL agreed with Mr. Hudson in thinking that if two towns were anxious to form a railway communication with each other, and the landowners on the line had no objection, and capitalists were willing to provide for the necessary expenditure, it would be a strong interference of Parliament to say that such communication should not be established. If it were true that the carrying these railroad schemes into execution was calculated to derange the monetary circulation of the country, then the First Lord of the Treasury or the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to state what amount of derangement they apprehended, and what limitation it was intended to place upon the amount of capital to be expended. The consideration of the latter point was too important to be referred to any committee, especially as it was well known that Parliament had never interfered to restrain the application of British capital to public works in Germany, France, and South America. If Government was determined to persevere with this committee, he hoped that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would in a manner state what he would state to the committee his opinion on the limit which he intended to fix on capital. The committee would then make its report to the House, and the House would then know how to decide upon it. After some further discussion, the Earl of LINCOLN, on behalf of the Government, declared that it had made up its mind as to the limit which ought to be fixed to the amount of capital to be applied to Railroads in this session, and that those Members of the Government who were to serve on the committee would declare the opinion of the Government on that point, and on several others, to the committee.—The motion was ultimately agreed to, and the committee appointed.

MORNING SITTINGS ON WEDNESDAYS. Several resolutions were agreed to, the result of which is, that the House will meet on Wednesdays at twelve, and sit till six.

The House adjourned at nine o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS. TUESDAY.

Several petitions were presented upon the subject of the Corn-laws.

NEW HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT. The LORD CHANCELLOR said, he presumed there could be no objection to the reappointment of the Committee of their Lordships' House, to inquire into the progress of the building of the new Houses of Parliament. He would, therefore, suggest the reappointment of the former Committee, with the addition of the name of the Earl of Ellenborough.—The motion was agreed to.

EARLY BUSINESS. In answer to some questions from the Marquis of CLANRICARDE, the Earl of DALHOUSIE gave notice that on Thursday he would bring under their Lordships' consideration the mode in which it was advisable they should proceed with reference to the Railway Bills introduced into this House.

The Earl of CLANCARTY gave notice, that on Thursday, the 5th of February, he would move for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the laws for the relief of the destitute and sick poor in Ireland.

Their Lordships then adjourned to Thursday.

COMMERCE AND PEACE.

While the Premier's plan is undergoing examination among the constituencies, and before it is submitted to the searching debate it will raise in both branches of the Legislature, it may not be amiss to consider briefly what may be its probable effects on those foreign countries with which we have the most extensive intercourse. Anything that affects the commerce of England has an immediate and direct action on that of the whole world. It is impossible to exaggerate the extent of the disasters that a gradual decay or sudden stoppage of the great demand in England for foreign produce would occasion. Not single establishments, not houses and firms, not even a few cities and towns would go to ruin, but whole countries, races, and nations would have to trace to that diminution their "decline and fall." The consumption of one article of luxury, port wine, alone, in this country constitutes the chief trade of Portugal, and the cessation of that demand would plunge that country into extreme difficulties, in which all classes would suffer. France is more self-sustained, and her commerce has at once a more independent existence and a wider range; but the trade with England is an immense item in it. America is indebted to our demand for her cotton for the prosperity, or rather the existence, of her Southern States. We acknowledge the benefit to be mutual, and that the looms of Manchester would stand still if that supply were stopped, and a frightful amount of human suffering would be created. But in time a remedy for the evil would be found: we, too, have tropical possessions, wealth, and energy, and the plains of India might become the source of supply for this essential material.

The North of Europe derives a great portion of the amount of wealth it possesses, from its Timber Trade: scarcely a clime or country can be named but feels the effects of that mighty enterprise of which England is the seat. Their produce flows to her as to a centre—from the action of principles as certain and unvarying in their operation as the laws of Nature itself—there to be wrought by her skill into forms that multiply its value, and in those forms to be sent forth again for the use of the world at large. We are becoming the workshop of the world, and feed ourselves by clothing the universe, or manufacturing for it in some shape or other: we are the depôt to which nations in a less advanced stage send their raw material to be made up; and Steam, Iron, Coal, Railways, and the skill that has known how to apply our natural powers, and create others, form our tools and stock-in-trade. Such a weaving, forging, clattering, busy hive of men was never collected on the Earth's surface as that which peoples this nook and corner of the world, England, at the present day.

What we do, therefore, must have a reflex action on the rest of the world, and the present change will not be without its effect upon other nations; two of them, France and America, are and have been the greatest sources of uneasiness to us; in America, territorial questions have for half a century been among the "vexed" ones which statesmen in both countries have had to decide, not always without unpleasant feelings being excited, and speech and writing of a description the reverse of amicable; and never did the hostile sentiments which such questions excite prevail more strongly than at the present moment. France, and, unfortunately, England also, has inherited the traditional animosity of ages, created and carried down for centuries by frequent wars and the deadliest public and private injuries one people can inflict on another. The efforts of able statesmen in both countries have hitherto preserved peace between them, but it is held, we fear, by a frail tenure; and, however averse England might be to a war, if attacked she has no alternative but to strike in self-defence; the most peaceably disposed may be forced into a quarrel. It is no slight proof that national feelings and jealousies do not guide us in making our commercial changes, when it can be proved that our present relaxations will have a favourable effect on the commerce, and consequently the prosperity, of both those countries, from one of which we now hear the language of the most violent enmity—from the other, the words of friendship and amity are never expected, either from the mass of its people or the organs which represent them. Henceforth, whenever scarcity impends over England, it will probably be from America that the greatest supply of food will be derived, for she has great facilities of inland communication by river and railway, which the less advanced agricultural countries of the old world, Poland and the south of Russia, have not. We cannot think but this must have some effect in moderating that insane spirit of jealousy which paints England as the great usurper and absorber of all the wealth and territory of all nations. America threatens war, and we reply by throwing open to her increased opportunities of cultivating the pursuits of peace: the thrust of the Sword is parried with the Olive branch!

France, too, cannot but be benefited largely by the new Tariff: the decrease in the duties on silks and brandies will cause a large consumption of both. We may be told that the change would never have been made if it would not benefit ourselves: this is true enough, but how much of the past commercial legislation of the world has been framed with the direct intention of injuring others without procuring that self-advantage? There is some merit in being the first to depart from this unwise system. It never succeeded. Let any country, by a high prohibitive duty exclude an article its people wish to buy, and the trade that instant becomes contraband. The Berlin Decrees did not check the trade of England with the Continent, as they were meant to do—they merely made it contraband. We have seen this activity of the smuggler derided as only showing the weakness and neglect of the laws and Government, but, look at Spain! There the highest duties and the most stringent Custom-house code have exactly secured this result, that nineteen Spaniards out of twenty wear nothing but foreign manufactures, that the revenue is annihilated, the people impoverished, and the smuggler enriched; every body suffers by the folly and absurdity of the system except those who violate it. Silks and brandies were the great staples of our contraband traffic; the high duties on them were no protection to the British weaver or distiller, and the lessening them will throw the trade into more legitimate channels. It is to be hoped that in France, too, the influence of commerce and increased intercourse will evoke a larger and more generous manifestation of spirit of peace than has been shown: that we are not really hostile to the best interests of that country; may it be so regarded: and we cannot avoid expressing a confident hope that an increased motive to preserve "friendly relations" between the great nations of the world, will be among the best effects of the present tendencies of Commercial Legislation.

GRAND STATE PROCESSION AT HONG-KONG.

The town of Victoria, in Hong-Kong, has just been a scene of great festivity, and pageant splendour, on the occasion of the British authorities entertaining the High Imperial Commissioner Keying. The details of this State Visit fill five columns of the China Mail, the official organ of all Government notifications at Hong-Kong; and which, on this day (November 27, 1845) we received; an that on the office at Victoria might be seen inscribed "Second Edition—The High Imperial Commissioner Keying's Visit;" just as the fate of Ministries is announced in Fleet-street or the Strand. We have only space for the leading details from the China Mail:

"On Thursday, the 20th, about sunset, the Vixen steamer arrived with the High Imperial Commissioner Keying and suite, accompanied by the Hon. Major Caine, Chief Magistrate; A. W. Elmslie, Esq., Secretary to the Superintendent of Trade; and the Chinese Colonial Secretary, the Rev. Charles Gutzlaff, who had been deputed to proceed to Canton for the purpose. A considerable number of the inhabitants and a crowd of Chinese were in waiting at the Commissariat, to witness the landing, which took place under the British salute of a Minister Plenipotentiary. His Excellency was received by the Commandant, who, along with the Aides-de-Camp of the Governor and General, conducted him to the spacious residence in the Queen's-road, which Messrs. D. and M. Rustomjee had handsomely placed at the free disposal of Government for its purpose.

"As the barge approached the wharf, the Chinese band 'poured around a torrent of shrill sounds,' and, on Keying's stepping on shore, three gigantic crackers were fired off. Having advanced a few paces, an attendant with a brass bowl presented the soles of his immense shoes, and the materials of a process, composed of English, Chinese, and Indians, proceeded along the road, producing a most picturesque effect. Preceded by the band of the Chinese band, making, like that of Chrononhotonthologos, "rough music," followed by a parcel of boys fluttering little banners.

Our Correspondent gives the Order of the Procession, with official minuteness; premising, "you may think the characters represented to be flights of imagination; but, I assure you they are copied from life; the only fault is in the number, as the High Commissioner has attended, in his visit to Hong-Kong, by at least 200 followers, making a procession a quarter of a mile long.

We return to the China Mail:—

In front of the mat shed, which we still dignify by the name of Church, a number of ladies seated on couches attracted the special regard of the Minister. As he approached his residence, a detachment of the 42nd Regt. contrived to make the usual unpleasantly clear; and at the door he was received by Captain Bruce, Assistant Adjutant General.

The next forenoon, the Governor (Sir John Davis, known by his excellent works descriptive of China), accompanied by the Major-General, the military staff, called upon Keying, who received his visitors with his accustomed graceful urbanity, embracing his Excellency and the General. Being a visit of compliment, Keying, when the company rose, conducted the Governor to the outer door, and took leave.

In the afternoon, the Chinese returned the visit in state, and afterwards accompanied the Governor to witness a review of the troops, when they found drawn up in line in the Queen's Road. Keying went down the line in his chair, each regiment presenting arms to him as he arrived in front of its centre. The Chinese seemed much interested in the marches and countermarches, and frequently asked questions about the purpose of the various evolutions. Before returning to their chairs, on the suggestion of the Major-General, they proceeded to the esplanade to witness the artillery salutes; Hubner, with the clear guns of the 42nd, and the more distinguished members of his suite dined at the Governor's, where they met the General, Admiral, and heads of departments. Afterwards, there was a drama; but Keying, feeling fatigued with the day's exertions, retired early, and was, as usual, accompanied to his chair by his host.

During the forenoon of the day following, his Excellency honoured Mr. Gutzlaff with a call: in the afternoon a long conference, which lasted upwards of two hours was held between the Governor and Imperial Commissioner; and when it broke up they proceeded to inspect the Royal Naval and Military hospitals. In the evening, the Chinese heard the Agincourt, which they had visited in the morning. The ship, profusely decorated with flags, was illuminated from stem to stern, and when the Royal salute was fired, the effect, as seen the shore, was magnificent. The deck, covered with awnings, formed a spendid ball-room, and the Mandarins, greatly struck with this union of power and refinement, declared that a hundred years would not suffice to produce anything like it in China.

Next morning, the Minister and some of the Mandarins made an excursion round the island in the Plato steamer, accompanied by the Governor and the Admiral. The sea being a little rough, Mr. Austin, the Admiral's secretary, was the only whole, was fine, and he expressed himself much gratified with the trip.

In the evening the Imperial Commissioner partook of the well-known and hearty hospitality of the Royal Irish, the officers, some 30 in number, being entertained by the Major-General at dinner, consisting of the Light Company of the Royal Irish in full dress, accompanied by the band and regimental colour, was drawn up along the Major-General's residence, a little before six o'clock. The effect of the martial appearance of the guard, was not a little heightened by innumerable flambeaux blazing in front of the house.

The party at dinner was limited to sixteen. The dining room was decorated with the colours of the Royal Irish, and 42nd Madras N.I. At the centre was placed the Imperial standard of China, waving beside the banner of England. Over the doorways were hung appropriate Chinese mottoes on crimson silk, expressive of the friendship existing between the two nations; this being in accordance with Chinese custom.

Only two toasts were drank during the evening

"The Queen of England and the Emperor of China, and may the happy relations subsisting between the two countries be productive of increased commerce and prosperity to both."

"The health of Keying, the enlightened statesman, and who, alike the friend of England and of China, has taught us to respect him as much for his political talents, as we value him for his social qualities."

Keying listened with great attention, and seemed anxious to have every sentiment fully as the General went along. Keying replied with great grace and cordialness, to the effect that, "though his talents had been greatly overrated, the General had only done justice to his sincerity, for he could assure him, on the faith of a Tartar Soldier, that he had ever had any voice in the affairs of China, the peace and prosperity of both our countries would be always the objects nearest to his heart."

Nothing could exceed the affability and good humour of Keying, accompanied by the highest tact and good breeding. He was jovial at dinner, but without excess; and after having volunteered a Mauchow Tartar song, which he gave with great spirit, the company adjourned to the drawing-room, where a party, consisting of the ladies of the garrison, with most of the naval and military officers, and civil residents, had assembled. Keying went the round of the room with the utmost blandness, offering his hand to each of the ladies, and distinguishing one or two of them by little presents of purses or rosaries.

Some instances of the urbanity of the well-bred Tartar are then related: as, his kindness to a little girl, whom he took upon his knee and caressed, placing an ornament about her neck. A married lady who was sitting near him, attracted a good deal of his attention; and, having desired one of his attendants to bring him a silk handkerchief, he presented it to her, and begged he might retain her own in exchange for it. The lady was momentarily embarrassed; and Keying seeing this, said "he hoped he had done nothing contrary to our usages of propriety" an apology which was immediately appreciated and understood.

On the fourth day, Keying gave the return dinner, a sumptuous entertainment in the Chinese fashion: the host receiving the Governor, and conducting him to a seat in the centre of the room—the rest of the company sitting in arm-chairs fantastically placed on either side, with a small table between each two. The half-hour before dinner, proverbially dull and trying to the patience in Europe, is in China relieved by the assiduous attentions of the entertainers, and by refreshments of the finest tea, which are offered to each guest in little cups; what with us is the saucer being made to perform the more useful office of a cover to preserve the aroma.

The Dinner, our Correspondent says, was given in a room 100 feet by 50ft. covered with red cloth, and lighted by twenty very handsome Chinese lanterns; there were forty guests, and the banquet lasted from six till ten o'clock, during which time there was a ceaseless succession of dishes. Keying paid great attention to his guests, and proposed several toasts and sentiments; and there was no lack of champagne and cherry brandy.

The ménu of this dinner is described, in the China Mail, as differing in several respects from the descriptions of Du Halde, Father Bouvet, and other more modern writers; and, instead of a small table for each guest, there was, as we have said, only a single table for the English and the host, for the whole company; and except such a general invitation to be seated as might have passed unnoticed in Europe, there were none of the ceremonious bows to individuals which Father Bouvet speaks of.

We have not room for all the details: there were chop-sticks laid, but, the Mandarins occasionally used the fork and spoon; at the left hand was a small saucer of sweetmeats, after which came a

IMPORTANT NEWS FROM INDIA.

INVASION OF THE BRITISH TERRITORY BY THE SIKH ARMY.

The Overland India Mail arrived on Thursday morning, viâ Trieste, with the Bombay mails of the 1st of January. They contain the important news that the Sikh army had crossed the Sutlej; and that they having thus declared war against the British, the Governor-General had issued the following proclamation on the 13th of December:—

PROCLAMATION BY THE RIGHT HON. THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF INDIA.

The British Government has ever been on terms of friendship with that of the Punjab

In the year 1809, a treaty of amity and concord was concluded between the British Government and the late Maharajah Runjeet Singh, the conditions of which have always been faithfully observed by the British Government, and were scrupulously fulfilled by the late Maharajah.

The same friendly relations have been maintained with the successors of Maharajah Runjeet Singh by the British Government up to the present time.

Since the death of the late Maharajah Sher Singh, the disorganized state of the Lahore Government has made it necessary on the Governor-General in Council, to adopt precautionary measures for the protection of the British frontier; the nature of these measures, and the cause of their adoption, were at the time fully explained to the Lahore Durbar.

Notwithstanding the disorganized state of the Lahore Government during the last two years, and many most unfriendly proceedings on the part of the Durbar, the Governor-General in Council has continued to evince his desire to maintain the most friendly relations which had so long existed between the two states for the mutual interests and happiness of both. He has shown on every occasion the utmost forbearance from consideration to the helpless state of the infant Maharajah Dhuleep Singh, whom the British Government had recognised as the successor to the late Maharajah Sher Singh.

The Governor-General in Council sincerely desired to see a strong Sikh Government re-established in the Punjab, able to control its army and to protect its subjects. He had not, up to the present moment, abandoned the hope of seeing that important object effected by the patriotic efforts of the Sikhs and people of that country.

The Sikh army has now, without a shadow of provocation, invaded the British territory.

The Governor-General must, therefore, take measures for effectually bringing that contest to a close, for vindicating the authority of the British Government, and for punishing the violators of treaties, and the disturbers of public peace.

The Governor-General hereby declares the possessions of Maharajah Dhuleep Singh, on the left of the bank of the Sutlej, confiscated and annexed to the British territories.

The Governor-General will respect the existing rights of all Jaghirdars, Zemindars, and tenants, in the said possessions, who, by the course they now pursue, evince their fidelity to the British Government.

The Governor-General here calls upon all the Chiefs and Sirdars in the protected territories to cooperate cordially with the British Government for the punishment of the treacherous enemy, and for the maintenance of order in these states. Those of the chiefs who show alacrity and fidelity in the discharge of this duty will find they owe to the protection of their powerful friend increase presented thereby, and those who take a contrary course will be treated as enemies to the British Government, and will be punished accordingly.

The possessions of all the territories on the left bank of the Sutlej are hereby directed to abide peaceably in their respective villages, where they will receive official protection by the British Government. All parties of men found in armed bands who can give no satisfactory account of their proceedings, will be treated as disturbers of the public peace.

All subjects of the British Government, and those who possess estates on both sides the river Sutlej, who by their faithful adherence to the British Government may be liable to sustain loss, shall be indemnified and secured in all their just rights and privileges.

On the other hand, all subjects of the British Government who shall continue in the service of the Sikh Sirdars, and who disobey this proclamation by not immediately returning to their allegiance, will be liable to have their property on this side the Sutlej confiscated, and declared to be aliens and enemies of the British Government.

By order of the Right Hon. the Governor-General of India,

F. CURRIE.

Secretary to the Government of India with the Governor-General.

CAMP, Lashkuree Khan-ke-Serai, Dec. 13, 1845.

BOMBAY, Jan. 3.

To understand the Sikh character, it is necessary to explain that they follow the tenets of Nunck, who four centuries ago formed a religion from Hindooism and Mahometanism, which united the taste of both, and rejected that of neither. Guided by their "Geeroos," or priests, they fought and gained considerable territories in the Punjab, or Country of the Five Rivers.

Some of the troops, and especially those of Rajpoot descent, assumed the appellation of Singhs, or Lions. Runjeet Singh, by his abilities, succeeded in placing himself at their head. He died in June, 1839, since which time three of his successors have been assassinated. Dhuleep Singh is but a boy, and the troops refuse to obey his feeble sceptre

The Singhs resemble, in a great measure, the Janissaries at Constantinople; and they consume the right of selecting their own rulers. The Punjab contains a tribe of the wildest fanatics, who look upon all men as objects of hatred, unless those who profess the Sikh faith. The Sikh troops are stated to amount in number to about 70,000 men, without the least idea of the land; for, like the late Janissaries, they admit recruits of all classes, on those recruits adopting their tenets

The Sikh troops, inflated with vanity, and desirous of plunder, came to the resolution of invading the British territory; and they, notwithstanding the reluctance of their Government, marched in the end of November and the beginning of December to the Sutlej, a distance of about fifty miles from Lahore. Crossing by They forced the Queen Mother's paramour, Lall Singh, to accompany them as a hostage for her behaviour during their absence. On the 26th of November one division of them reached Ferozepore, and on the 28th Buttoura. The other two columns moved in parallel routes, and on the 8th of December the whole force reached the banks of the Sutlej, forming a line extending from Kussoor, opposite to Ferozepore, to the Hurreeke Ghat. Tej Singh, who was to be one of their principal leaders, endeavoured by various excuses to delay his departure from Lahore. The Punt or Council of Officers guided the troops in their proceedings.

The Governor-General left Delhi on the 12th of November, and reached Umballa on the 26th, when he had an interview with the Commander-in-Chief, Sir H. Gough, and with Major Broadfoot, both of whom had come by dâk from Umballa. It was at this meeting that the Governor-General expressed his approbation of the measures adopted by the military authorities in assembling troops to the river's bank. On the 27th the Governor-General again began his march, and on the 2nd of December he arrived at Loodiana, where he remained until the 7th, busy in reviewing the troops; and, on that day, he moved out of the fort, as if to proceed to Ferozepore. On the 11th, he rode from his camp, 16 miles' distance, to Loodiana, to inspect the troops. On the 3th, the determination of the Sikh soldiery to cross the Sutlej became known, and orders were issued for the assembly of the army and the Vakeel of the Lahore Government was desired to retire from the Company's territories. The proclamation was issued on the 13th, and, on the 17th, the Governor-General's camp was at Bussean, within 37 miles of the Sikhs. The Commander-in-Chief was stationed, on that day, within five miles of the Governor-General's camp. On the 13th, 15,000 Sikhs, with 37 guns, crossed the river, by a ford about 12 miles above Ferozepore, and, on the 13th, they were about seven miles from it, still crossing men and guns, by a bridge of boats.

The British army was consequently composed of 11 complete troops of horse artillery, 11 companies of foot artillery, with four light field batteries, a 12-pounder elephant battery of 18 guns, 14 24-pounders, eight howitzers, and mortars preparing; three European with seven light cavalry regiments, including the body guard; four complete corps, and a wing of the 5th Irregular Cavalry; nine European and six native regiments of Infantry, and almost the whole corps of Bengal Sappers and Miners. The above corps in movement to reinforce the army

Rumour states that Sir H. Hardinge was likely to have a general battle on the 20th of December, but this fact was doubted, especially as he is supposed to be following the cautious tactics of the Wellington school, and not to be disposed to strike unless he can give a blow with power and effect. The Sikhs were kept in check near Ferozepore by a force under Sir John Littler, who commanded that station, and who caused field works to be thrown up on the line of supposed attack by the Sikhs. Reports have been current that he had defeated a body of the Sikhs on the 10th, and that he had lost eight officers.

The number of Sikhs that crossed the river before the 14th was said to amount to 30,000, with seventy guns. Their great object appears to be plunder, which they expected to find without any difficulty. They have brought their own provisions for the campaign, as they dread being poisoned if they use any food found in the British districts. They are said also to be alarmed at taking Ferozepore, which is described by them as being underwater, and to be in an unhealthy situation. They vacillate very much before they invaded the British territory, and appeared to be more so on finding their progress resisted. The Ranee, or Queen-Mother, remained at Lahore, declaring the progress of the Sikh troops, who refused to obey her. At her request, a force had been sent back to Lahore, to protect her and die capital.

Apprehensions were entertained that the Sikh troops would separate themselves into plundering bands, and scatter destruction through the British provinces to Seiks, Hindoos, &c. Hence great anxiety prevailed as to the results of the patched battle which was expected on the 20th of December.

Moultan is a tributary province of Lahore, and the troops stationed there, to the number of 5,000 men, were directed by the Lahore Government to march Bhawulpore They were under the command of Dewan Moolraj, the Nazim or Governor of Moultan.

News of the invasion of the British territory had reached Sir Charles Napier on the 24th of December, and her Majesty's 86th Regiment and the 12th Bengal Native Infantry, and all the other disposable troops there, were instantly ordered to prepare for marching to the frontiers of the Punjab. The 2nd Regiment Bombay Europeans, her Majesty's 17th Regiment, and the 4th Native Infantry, and 11th Regiments of Bombay Native Infantry, were under orders for starting in the steamers from Bombay for Kurrachee, en route for Scinde, to reinforce the Scinde army.

The latest news from Cabul describes a great breach between Akbar and Sultan Jan, which, it is said, has given rise to excite disturbances. Jubbar Mohammed had grown suspicious of all persons except his sons, to whom alone he confided the command of his troops.

Of Futteh Singh, who some time back raised a revolt at Attock, it is not known whether he is dead or alive. Some suppose him a prisoner in the fort of one of the chiefs.

January 2

The steamer was delayed in consequence of the non-arrival of the Governor-General's despatches. The steamers which took up to Kurrachee the first detachment of troops from Bombay returned yesterday, and one started this morning, and others are to start to-morrow, with her Majesty's 17th Regiment, and detachments of artillery.

It was rumoured at Kurrachee that an engagement had taken place between the advance guard of the British army and the Sikhs at Moodkee, in which the 3rd Dragoons did great execution, by routing the enemy, and taking 17 guns General M'Caskell is said to have died of his wounds on the following day The date is not stated

Great anxiety prevailed respecting the position of the Governor-General and the Commander-in-Chief, and their army, which was stationed between Loodiana and Ferozepore, in such a manner as to be liable to have the communications with Delhi intercepted

The main body of our troops, advancing from Umballa towards Ferozepore, were, on the 17th of December, at Bussean, within thirty-five miles of the Sikh army, and with the Commander-in-Chief close by. On the 22nd it was known that the Lahore troops, to the number of 30,000, with 70 guns, had crossed the river Sutlej, and had taken up such a position as would enable them to intercept the Ferozepore mails. None of later date than the 13th of December had reached Cawnpore.

The dâk between Loodiana and Ferozepore is stopped, and the whole of the intermediate jungle swarming with plunderers of the worst description.

The departure of the steamer, which was fixed for noon this day, has been further postponed till five o'clock this evening.

Every exertion is making at this port to send troops of all kinds off to Scinde, to enable Sir Charles Napier to move at the head of a large force.

Friday Evening

The mails are now closing, although the Governor-General's despatches have not arrived.

LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

ALEXANDRIA, Jan. 22.

The steamer Victoria, left Bombay on the afternoon of the 3rd inst., and brings the important information of the invasion of the British territory by a large Sikh force on the 21st of December, on which a battle immediately took place:—

"BOMBAY TIMES EXTRA

"TIMES OFFICE, Saturday, Twelve A.M., Jan. 3.

"A despatch arrived this morning from the Governor-General from Ferozepore, which mentions that a battle had taken place at that place. Our forces had stormed one of the enemy's positions, and were preparing to attack the other when the despatch left. Sir H. Hardinge led the centre, Sir H. Gough the right, and Sir John Littler the left. The slaughter was very great. Further particulars have not yet reached us. The steamer Victoria had made considerable way out of the harbour when the above despatch arrived, when she was immediately recalled, and returned into port about half-past ten o'clock."

The despatch is dated from Umballa, the 26th of December.

Eleven o'Clock.

The news is that the battle took place at Ferozepore. The Governor-General led the centre, the Commander-in-Chief the right, and Sir John Littler the left. The centre and right held their ground well; the left was hard pressed. The troops had stormed one position, and were preparing to attack the other, when the despatch left. The slaughter was very great.

There is no doubt of this, as Mr Cochrane, the barrister, has just come from Government House, where the Governor announced publicly the news.

This intelligence relieves us from all apprehensions relative to the garrison of Ferozepore, and to the positions of the army. The Sikhs lost 65 guns. The fighting was for three days, day and night.

The British occupied the Sikh camp.

Noon

Another report is that the Sikh force of more than 50,000, and 150 pieces of artillery, invaded the British possessions on the 21st of December. A battle was the immediate result, which lasted till the 23rd, and was not over when the express left. The loss was great on both sides, but the enemy suffered most, and lost 65 pieces of cannon. It is also said that Sir John Littler was forced to retire on the first attack, and that the enemy were only routed on the advance of the Governor-General and the Commander-in-Chief. No doubts were entertained that the enemy would shortly be driven across the Sutlej

The steamer is about to start

[It is right to state that we are indebted to the Times for the above important news That paper received the express exclusively. It was brought by a courier viâ Trieste, who exhibited, as a contemporary says, "a splendid specimen of a Sikh," not speak a word of English. He performed the journey from Dwino, near Trieste, in some hours less than six days.]

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS. MONDAY.

The House sat for a short time only, and nothing of importance occurred.

Lord KINNAIRD moved for "a Return of the Amount of Fees incurred by the Introduction of Railway Bills into this House during the last Session of Parliament, and by Petition against such Bills, and how applied." The noble Lord mentioned the case of one railway, the cost of which was £300,000; but an opposition being raised to it, the cost of meeting that opposition amounted to no less a sum than £15,000; and in another case in which a private gentleman opposed a railway, all the attorneys' accounts amounted to £900, of which the fees of Parliament took up £300.—The return was agreed to.

In answer to a question from Lord MONTEAGLE, the Earl of ABERDEEN said he did not object to lay upon the table a copy of the report of the Board of Fees incurred by the Treasury of the United States, upon the subject of the tariff of that country. The noble Earl added that the report contained much which was well worthy of serious consideration.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY

NEW WRIT. On the motion of Mr. NEWDEGATE, a new writ was ordered for the county of Rutland, in the room of the Hon. William Dawnay, who had accepted the Chiltern Hundreds.

THE TEN HOURS BILL.—Mr. FIELDEN gave notice that, inasmuch as his name appeared along with his noble friend, Lord Ashley's, on the back of the bill for limiting the labour of young persons and females to ten hours in the day, and his noble friend having accepted the Chiltern Hundreds, it was his (Mr. Fielden's) intention to proceed with it on the 18th of February, or as soon after as possible

THE MILITIA.—Mr T. DUNCOMBE put some questions with respect to the militia, in answer to which, Mr. SIDNEY HERBERT said he thought there was much apprehension abroad upon the subject. The Government had no intention of calling out the militia under the present law; but it was the intention of her Majesty's Government to introduce a bill to amend and consolidate the militia laws; and when that act should have been passed, it would be in the power of the Government to call out the militia to certain. Whether or no they would ever call them out to train depended upon other circumstances. If called out, however, they would be called out to train, and to train only; but as there seemed to be considerable apprehension on the subject, and as clubs were being formed, he should take that opportunity of stating that he hoped the public would not put themselves to any further inconvenience until they had heard what the Government was about to do. He was desirous of encouraging and passing a measure for raising the militia without so obnoxious a mode as the ballot. (Hear, hear, hear.) He trusted that all the preparations people were making to preserve themselves would be suspended until the public could have had an opportunity of seeing and judging of the measure about to be introduced. (Hear, hear, cheering.)

RELAXATION OF DUTIES.—Mr. P. M. STEWART asked if the Government intended to alter the duties on colonial spirits, and the prohibitions against sugar and molasses?—Sir R. PEEL said the Government did not intend to touch the duties on sugar or molasses; nor was it the intention of the Government to make any alterations in the present duties in England, Ireland, and Scotland respectively. Great inconvenience would arise from the adoption of such a course With regard to sugar and molasses, they could not be used in private breweries and in distilleries, under certain regulations, but they were prohibited from use in conjunction with distillation from grain

The House then resumed the Drainage (Ireland) Bill, and the Public Works (Ire and) Bill, both of which were advanced a stage

GAME-LAWS. Mr. BAILEY moved the re-appointment of the committee of last year on the subject of the Game-laws, the names of the members constituting the committee being the same as last year. Agreed to.

Leave was given to Sir T. FREMANTLE to introduce a bill to alter and amend the law of settlement in the counties of small piers and harbours, and also to extend the fisheries in Ireland; and the House adjourned soon after seven o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The House sat only for about half-an-hour to-day.

On the motion of the LORD CHANCELLOR a bill, which was intended to relieve her Majesty's subjects from certain penalties and disabilities with regard to religious opinions, was introduced, and read a first time.

The House adjourned till Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY

NEW MEMBERS.—The following Members, recently elected, took the oaths and their seats: Spencer Horatio Walpole, Esq., for Midhurst, the Hon. E. M. L. Mostyn, for Lichfield; and John Stuart, Esq., for Newcastle

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS. In answer to a question from Mr. R. YORKE, Sir R. PEEL said that he was not prepared, on the part of her Majesty's Government, to say that it was their intention to introduce any bill respecting ecclesiastical Courts.

TIMBER DUTIES.—Sir R. PEEL made an announcement respecting his intended reductions on the timber duties. He proposed that, on the 5th of April, 1846, a further reduction of 5s. should also take place. On sawn timber, he proposed that the present duty should be reduced on the 5th of April, 1847, 6s.; and, on the 5th of April, 1848, 5s. more. With regard to the duties on laths, spars, and oars, he proposed to make a proportional reduction; but he reserved to himself the power of considering whether that reduction should, or should not, be immediate from the 5th of April, 1846. In reply to a question from Mr. Hawes, Sir R. Peel replied that no reduction of the timber duties would take place on the 5th of April, 1846.

THE TARIFF AND FREE TRADE.—Mr. WODEHOUSE moved for a copy of the warrant appointing Mr. H. S. Chapman Chief Judge of the Supreme Court at Wellington, in New Zealand; and also of the documents relative to the tariff of the United States. He had received high testimonials of the merits of Mr. Chapman, and did not doubt that Lord Stanley had exercised a wise discretion in making the appointment; but Mr. Chapman, as an Assistant Commissioner to inquire into the condition of the hand-loom weavers, had made deceptive and delusive statements, entrapping the Government into that Free-Trade course which had since been unhappily pursued. The hon. member also described generally on the impolicy of Free-Trade views. Dr. BOWRING stated the result of several interviews with Mehemet Ali, the Pacha of Egypt, on the subject of Protection and Corn-laws, in which he had endeavoured to controvert the views of the Pacha, and to gain his adherence to a somder policy. His own experience as a commercial diplomatist had taught him the value and importance of Sir Robert Peel's declaration, that he was weary of negotiations in favour of reciprocity, and that it was better we should teach by our example than wait for the effect of our precepts.—Mr Wodehouse's motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC WORKS (IRELAND) BILL.—This Bill, upon the motion of Sir T. FREMANTLE, was read a third time and passed.

CHARITIES IN IRELAND.—Mr. TRELAWNEY inquired if the Government intended to bring in any Bill this session with respect to charitable trusts?—Sir J. GRAHAM said the Lord Chancellor would shortly introduce into the House of Lords a Bill on the subject.—The House adjourned at a quarter before six o'clock

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY

The House of Commons met at twelve o'clock, and was occupied during its sitting chiefly with private business

In reply to a question from Mr KEMBLE, Sir J. GRAHAM said there was an intention on the part of the Government to extend the jurisdiction of Courts of Request throughout the country to £20. It was a measure, however, which required great caution in the preparation, and it would be some time, therefore, before he would be enabled to lay the bill upon the table.

GRINDING BONES IN POOR-LAW UNIONS.—In reply to a motion for papers made by Captain PECHELL, relating to the pounding and grinding of bones in Poor-law unions, Sir J. GRAHAM said that a general order had been issued by the Poor law Commissioners to put a stop to the practice. Subsequently, representations were made by several unions for permission to continue the practice, until some other employment could be found, and until the stock on hand was got rid of. In nine instances only had the application been granted, and even in those cases it was limited to three months, so that on the 1st of April the whole of such employment, which was certainly inexpedient in workhouses, would cease altogether throughout England and Wales.—The House continued sitting o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

REPORT OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON RAILWAYS. Lord DALHOUSIE said, he had been requested by the Committee appointed to consider the course to be adopted with respect to the future railway projects, which will be submitted to your Lordships, to report that they have met and agreed to the following resolution:—"Resolved That it is the opinion of this Committee that such portion of the Standing Order No. 244 as requires a deposit of one-tenth of the amount subscribed, should be suspended with respect to all such Railway Bills as shall commence in the House of Lords during the present session. That no such Railway Bills shall be read a first time in this House unless a deposit of one-twentieth part of the amount subscribed shall have been paid on or before the 5th of February. That no such Railway Bills should be read a third time until a further deposit of one-tenth part of the amount subscribed shall in like manner be paid. Resolved also, that it is the opinion of this Committee that this House should not receive any petition for a Railway Bill after Monday, the 23rd of February."

CHARITIES IN IRELAND.—The Earl of CLANCARTY moved for a Select Committee to inquire into medical charities in Ireland. The noble Earl went into a detail of the manner in which some of these charities were managed. He had received communications from all parts of Ireland on the subject, some of them containing very important suggestions.—The Duke of WELLINGTON said there was no disposition on the part of the Government to oppose the noble Earl, and the Committee was appointed The House adjourned soon after six.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

NEW MEMBER FOR SUSSEX.—Mr. Frewen took the necessary oaths and his seat for East Sussex, in the room of Mr. Darby.

PETITION FROM THE CITY OF LONDON FOR THE REPEAL OF THE CORN-LAWS. The Sheriffs Chapman and Lucas were introduced, and presented a petition from the Common Council in favour of an abolition of the Corn laws They also presented a petition from the Lord Mayor and Commons of the City, respecting Billingsgate market.

NEW WRIT FOR BUCKINGHAM.—A new writ was moved for Buckingham, in the room of Sir Thomas Fremantle, who had accepted the Chiltern Hundreds.

NEW SHERIFFS FOR DORSETSHIRE.—Mr. S. O Byrne, the writ for which were ordered for Dorsetshire, in the room of Lord Ashley and Mr. H. C. Sturt, who have accepted the Chiltern Hundreds.

MANY petitions were presented on the subject of the Corn-laws.

SIR ROBERT PEEL'S NEW PLAN.—In answer to a question from Mr. PATTISON, Sir R. PEEL said that as soon as the House should come to any resolution on the subject of the duties in conformity with the notice given before the House by her Majesty's Government, if it should come to any resolution, the reduction would take place from the date of the resolution Mr. ELLICE said that his constituents were in favour of the measure of the Government, but they were anxious to know how soon it would come into operation as respects silk.—Sir R. PEEL said that the people of Coventry were entitled to great credit for their readiness to consent to a reduction that he could not but consider a great sacrifice. He had no question beyond that he gave to the question put to him by the hon. Member for London

REPEAL OF PENAL ENACTMENTS. Mr. WATSON moved for leave to bring in a bill for the repeal of enactments imposing pains and penalties on her Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects on account of religion.—Sir J. GRAHAM said, that it was not his intention to offer any opposition to the motion of the hon. and learned gentleman. He merely wished to state that the attention of the Criminal Law Commissioners had been attracted to the subject, and on their recommendation a bill, embracing that and other matters, had been introduced into the other House of Parliament, and which it was the intention of the Government to follow up. Sir R. H. Inglis recommended the right hon. gentleman to leave the matter in the hands of the Government. After some discussion, leave was given to bring in the bill

The House adjourned before seven o'clock

RAILWAY COMMITTEES.—The Sub-Committees on Railway Petitions have met to consider the various railway bills, but hitherto the business has been merely formal, and nothing of importance has occurred.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS ON RAILWAYS

The following is a copy of the Report anxiously looked for, of the Committee of the House of Commons on Railways:—

"Resolved That, for the purpose of facilitating the dispatch of railway bills during the present session, it is expedient that a portion of the railway bills should commence in the House of Lords.

"That with respect to railways, which, in pursuance of this resolution, shall commence in the House of Lords during the present session, the House will not exercise its privileges in regard to excess fixing and regulating the amount of rates and tolls in such bills

"That with a view to afford early and increased means of employment in Ireland, it is expedient to give facilities for commencing such works in Ireland; and that, for the said purpose of this object, it is expedient that Irish railway bills should commence in the House of Lords.

"That it is expedient that all bills which ought to be considered to compete, in connection with any bills, the promoters of which shall prove themselves entitled to the privileges agreed to be granted in certain cases, by a resolution of this House, on the 7th of July last, shall commence in the House of Lords; that the parties promoting such railways as, by the above resolutions, are to commence in the House of Lords, may, notwithstanding any provisions respecting them, in the House of Lords, prove before the committee on petitions for railway bills in the House of Commons, that they have complied with the standing orders of this House, and the report of such committee shall be referred to the Chamber of Commons: "Resolved that, if the committee shall report that the standing orders have not been complied with, such report shall be referred to the Standing Orders Committee, and that their report shall be received like the other bills which shall have been complied with; but such report shall be on the table; if the report shall state that the standing orders have not been complied with, such report is to be referred to the Standing Orders Committee to report whether the standing orders ought or ought not to be dispensed with."

The Journal des Débats publishes a private letter from Palermo stating that the medical advisers of the Empress of Russia had held a consultation, at which it had been decided that her Majesty, in order to secure the perfect re-establishment of her health, ought to prolong her residence in that city. In consequence of this decision the Empress, it is said, will not attend the Carnival at Naples, as was her intention.

The Prussian Government has just prescribed to all branches of the army the study of horticulture. Encouragements are accorded to all the young soldiers who go out to work in the horticultural establishments about Berlin. The object is that when they have served out their time they may carry home some knowledge of horticulture.

A letter from Algiers, of January 23, in the Sentinelle de Toulon, states that amongst the number of persons who were brought in a frozen state to the hospital of Setif, from the 4th to the 7th ult., there were 18 officers, several of whom had to undergo amputation of both legs.

AKALEES OF THE SIKH ARMY.—FROM VON ORLICH'S TRAVELS.

THE SIKH ARMY.

The intelligence just received of the Sikh Army having crossed the Sutlej, and thus declared war against the British, will, doubtless, render the following picture of our new enemy of immediate interest. It is extracted from Von Orlich's "Travels in India," a faithful translation of which was published by Messrs. Longman and Co., in the spring of last year—to whose courtesy we are indebted for the loan of the annexed illustration. The writer is describing

A REVIEW OF THE SIKH ARMY.

Something more than a third part of the army which was assembled here consisted of regular troops, and of these about five thousand were cavalry. They are divided into divisions and brigades, and are under the immediate command of the European officers. The command is given in the French language, but the tactics differ in the various brigades; those which are under French officers being trained on the French system, while those under British officers according to the English tactics. Thus unity is wanting, and discipline is defective. A single mishap would cause a complete disruption of these troops, and endanger the lives of their commanders. This, in fact, happened to General Court, who, on the accession of Shere Singh, faithful to his oath, refused to do homage till the ex-regent had absolved him from his allegiance to her; on this, the general was attacked in his house by his own soldiers, and had a most miraculous escape.

These troops are better paid than those of the East India Company, but not so regularly, and two rupees per month are besides deducted from their pay for their maintenance. Their uniform is red and blue: some regiments wear chakos, but most of them turbans; they are armed in the same manner as the English. The cavalry is in general well mounted, and consists of cuirassiers and dragoons. With respect to the artillery, the guns are scarcely inferior to those of the English, but their horses are very indifferent. Their movements are rapid; their firing very unskilful, for of six shot from six-pounders only one hit the mark at a distance of 800 paces.

The irregular troops consist chiefly of cavalry, who are obliged to furnish their own horses, weapons, and clothing; some are armed with spears, shields, and bows, and the greater part of them have matchlock guns; they are excellent soldiers brave and vigilant, and are quickly rallied after a defeat. The irregular infantry, armed with guns and spears, can make no resistance in the open field. The most distinguished among them are the Chagaris, led by the Akalees; they are clothed in black and have black standards, with a lion embroidered on them.

We were a party of between forty and fifty elephants, and rode along the front. Generals Ventura's and Court's division was on the right wing; each regiment had its own band of music, and presented arms as we approached. Almost every one of the Sikh officers of these regular troops was dressed according to his own taste; some in English, others in French uniforms, or in a mixture of both: some wore turbans, or caps with shawls wrapped round them, and others helmets and chakos: some had high boots with coloured tops, others shoes; some wore white, and others coloured pantaloons. It was altogether a strange medley; General Court wore a French General's uniform, and joined us on his elephant. The irregular cavalry, about 10,000 strong, looked very picturesque—nay, antique.

As we approached the Akalees, those savage hordes set up a scornful shout; some galloped out of the ranks, and, with uplifted hands, abused the Maharaja; his Highness, however, who appeared quite used to this sort of thing, took no notice whatever, and said he was glad they had not pelted him with mud, as they had frequently done to Runjeet Singh on similar occasions.

We should add that Von Orlich's work has been admirably translated by Mr. H. E. Lloyd: it includes an excellent account of Sinde and the Punjab, and will, therefore, acquire a renewed interest by the recently received intelligence. The work is, moreover, well stored with statistical information and neat descriptive accounts of the country, far beyond mere traveller's gossip: here, for example, is a glimpse of the Punjab, the land of the Sikhs:—

The Punjab, or country of "five waters," (panj, five; ab, waters), covering an area of 6000 geographical square miles, lies between the Indus, the Sutlej, and the Himalaya mountains. The four streams which rise in these mountains, intersect the country, and divide it with the Indus into four distinct doabs. The first distrct lying between the Indus and the Jallum (Hydaspes), is 147 miles in breadth. The Jallum, a clear stream, from 300 to 400 yards across, flows in a sandy bed, at the rate of two miles an hour. Its temperature in December was 45 deg. Fahrenheit at sunrise, and rose during the day to 51 deg. It is the most sterile, the least cultivated, and the least populous part of the country; it is covered with undulating bare eminences, which rise considerably towards the centre, and is intersected by rugged declivities. The waters flow in deep beds, enclosed by high steep banks, and consequently cannot be employed in irrigation.

A letter in the Augsburg Gazette, from the banks of the Rhine, says, that the notifications by the Duke of Bordeaux of the marriage of his sister to the Powers of Europe, have received very polite replies, in which, however, every expression that could possibly have implied any kind of acknowledgment of the Pretender's rights was carefully avoided. The Prussian Monarch replied in an autograph letter. The reply of the Emperor of Russia has not yet arrived, or, at all events, is not yet known. Denmark alone has refused to receive the letters of notification.

THE AMBASSADOR OF MOROCCO, AT PARIS.

The arrival of this distinguished diplomatist in the French capital was announced by our Paris Correspondent, in our Journal of the 10th ult. His Moorish Excellency rejoices in the somewhat protracted name of Sid-el-Hadj Ab-el-Kader Ben-Mohammed-Acbache. He has been magnificently located in the Champs Elysées; and was visited, immediately after his arrival, by M. Guizot. A grand review took place in honour of the Ambassador, in the Champ de Mars, on the 17th, on which occasion our Artist sketched his Excellency and his suite, mounted on beautiful white Arabians, from the Royal stables; when the novel appearance of the mounted group, not omitting their almost grotesque costume, drew great crowds of spectators.

AMBASSADOR FROM THE EMPEROR OF MOROCCO, AT PARIS.

DESTRUCTION OF A MANUFACTORY AT NEWCASTLE, BY FIRE.

A very serious fire occurred on Tuesday morning at the extensive locomotive-engine manufactory of Messrs. R. and W. Hawthorn, at the Forth Banks, in Newcastle-upon-Tyne. The principal portion of the manufactory has been completely destroyed, together with a number of locomotive engines in progress, and nearly the whole of the valuable models of locomotive and other machinery.

The fire originated in the joiners' shop, which formed the second story of a building in the centre of the works, the lower story being the locomotive shop, where engines are put together after their several parts have been manufactured in the various parts of the establishment. Adjoining, and opening into the locomotive shop, was an apartment fitted up with lathes, screw-cutters, drilling, and various other machines, and immediately above this what was properly termed the model-room was situated. The model-room communicated with the joiners shop, where the tenders were built, and the whole of the upper portion of this apartment was occupied by models, in addition to the model-room, and all these have been entirely consumed.

In the locomotive shop there were seven locomotive engines in an advanced state, three about finished, and in the tender-room above was a corresponding number of tenders, some of them completed, and one in course of being packed to leave the premises. Nearly the whole of these have been destroyed, the heat having been so intense as to fuse a considerable portion of the metal, so that axles, rods, and frames were twisted into a thousand shapes, and all are now lying in one confused mass of ruin on the ground where the building previously stood, and the former site of which is indicated only by a portion of the exterior walls.

The fire was discovered between four and five o'clock in the morning by John Reside, the night watchman, who shortly before had let one of the workmen, a joiner, named Moscrop, into the premises to complete some work he had left unfinished the previous night. He observed the fire from the east window of the joiners' shop, and tried to effect an entrance, but could not for the smoke. He then gave the alarm, and Moscrop and another man who came into the yard at the time ran away for the fire engines and to give information to the foreman and the police. The fire-engines were on the spot with unusual celerity, but the fire had then attained such a height that all attempts to extinguish it were useless, so that the exertions of the firemen and police were chiefly directed towards preventing the fire spreading to the adjoining premises.

A detachment of soldiers from the garrison, with the brigade engine, were present on the ground, and rendered very essential service. An immense number of persons had collected outside the works, watching the progress of the devouring element, which raged with irresistible fury, and seemed to threaten the entire neighbourhood. In little more than an hour the work of destruction was complete, the roof of the building fell in, the ponderous wheels of the locomotive tenders burst through the burning rafters of the floor, and the whole place was wrapped in one intensely burning flame. The cause of the intensity of the hea and the magnitude of the flame was soon discovered to proceed from the gas, which had been turned into the pipes a few minutes before the fire broke out, and, on the melting of the pipes, which ran in various directions along the building, the gas ignited, and, being fed from the main, it continued to burn with appalling fury, till the supply was cut off by choking the pipe, the meter and the main tap being inaccessible from the fire. The workmen of the establishment were exceedingly active; but, from the first, it was evident that no efforts could save the principal building and its contents; but to those, with a few trifling exceptions, the destruction was confined. No one sustained any serious personal injury. The damage is estimated at from £16,000 to £20,000, and the works are insured in the Leeds and Yorkshire Insurance-office, but not, it is understood, to the entire amount of the loss.

The most serious inconvenience and loss will result from the suspension of the works, and the impossibility of completing contracts within the stipulated period. The house is understood to have contracts for work that will keep the establishment fully employed for three years to come, and the utmost exertions have been made for some time past to keep pace with the extraordinary demand for locomotive power in all parts of the world. Arrangements are being made, with the usual promptitude of the enterprising firm, to repair the damage with as little delay as possible.

The origin of the fire appears clearly traceable to Moscrop, the joiner, who entered the premises shortly after four o'clock in the morning, and who, it seems, went into the tender-room with a lantern to get his saw, as he confesses having opened the lantern door, and the fire was discovered by the watchman a very short time afterwards. These circumstances having come to the knowledge of the police, they made inquiries for Moscrop, and found that he had never been in the yard after leaving it when the fire broke out in order to fetch the engines. They proceeded to his lodgings, and found him sitting by the fire-side, on which they took him into custody, and conveyed him to the police-station, where a preliminary investigation has been instituted.

There can be no doubt whatever that the fire originated with Moscrop's lamp, but in what way it seems impossible to ascertain, as he stoutly denies having trimmed the wick when he had the lantern door open. Moscrop was re-examined on Wednesday, and, as the evidence only went to prove neglect, he was discharged.

THE LATE JOSEPH C. CARPUE, ESQ., F.R.S.

This eminent surgeon died on Friday, the 30th ult., aged 84; having attained the highest character in his profession, and leaving behind him the reputation of one of its most skilful members. In medicine, as in politics, he was a stanch and uncompromising reformer, and opposed with the most determined energy, the proceedings of the College of Surgeons, by the governing body of which, despite of his superior acquirements, he was constantly refused a seat at the Council. As a professional writer, Mr. Carpue was known by his work "On the Taliacothian Operation," and "On the High Operation of the Stone;" and, as a lecturer, by his admirable addresses on anatomy. Shortly after the opening of the Brighton Railway, Mr. Carpue, who had then retired from public life, and held only one appointment, that at the Vaccine establishment, was travelling on the line, when the frightful accident happened, by which so many lives were sacrificed. Two of Mr. Carpue's servants were killed on the spot, and he himself suffered severe injury, which, in all probability, laid the foundation of the fatal disorder, dropsy, which terminated his existence.

DOUBLE LAUNCH AT LIVERPOOL.

The animated and unusual spectacle of the launch, at the same time, of two splendid first-class iron steamers, took place on Wednesday week, at the ship-building works of Messrs. Sefton and Co., Sefton-street, Liverpool.

The dimensions of these two fine vessels are, as near as possible, the same: their burden, 763 tons; length between perpendiculars, 200 feet; depth, 17½ feet; beam, 28 feet; and their engines of 325 horse power. The Windsor, which is to ply between Liverpool and Belfast, is clinker built, and has very fine lines; her engines are constructed on the side lever principle. The Ajax, for the London and Cork trade, is carvel built, and not so fine, with direct levers.

About half-past ten o'clock, it then being nearly high tide, and all the preparations being perfected, Mrs. Grantham christened the Windsor, and Mrs. Hazleden the Ajax; the ceremony being hailed by the cheers of all present; and the stages being knocked away, the two noble vessels, one after the other, glided gracefully and majestically into the river, amid the reiterated plaudits of the spectators. After the visitors had partaken of a slight luncheon, prepared in one of the out-offices, Mr. Thos. Vernon, in neat and complimentary speeches, gave the healths of Mr. Hazleden, who acknowledged the compliment; and of Mr. John Grantham, the modeller and superintendent of the building of the Windsor. Mr. John Grantham also replied, and concluded by proposing the health of Mr. John Vernon, which was drank most enthusiastically. "Success to the Windsor and Ajax," "The Ladies," and several other toasts were also given.

According to the Liverpool Mail, iron ship-building is rapidly progressing at this port. Messrs. Vernon and Co. have another large steamer, 1300 tons burden, now in course of construction, for the Peninsular and Oriental Company. They have orders also for two others from the plans of Mr. Grantham, one about 700 tons, for the Cork Company, and the other about 300, for Fleetwood. At Messrs. Hodson and Co.'s works, Branswick Dock, there are no fewer than five now building, three of which are to be propelled by the screw, on the patent direct principle of Mr. Grantham; the fourth is about 300 tons, for the Bombay trade; and the fifth a ferry-boat, for Woodside. Mr. Cato has four not yet completed, also from the models of Mr. Grantham, two of which are to be fitted with the screw. Mr. J. Laird, of Birkenhead, has five iron steamers in the course of construction. The Government frigate, the Birkenhead, (engraved in No. 195 of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS), 1400 tons, is now receiving her engines at the Trafalgar Dock. The others are intended for the Folkstone station, and are to be built after the model of a steamer lately completed for the same line, called the Prince Ernest.

A Contemporary, in proof of the durability of iron vessels, states that the first iron steamer ever built on the Mersey was constructed by Messrs. Fawcett, Preston, and Co., in 1829; that it has since been in constant work in the home navigation of Ireland, and that it is even yet in good and serviceable condition.

THE PLANET "ASTREA."

The Stars' places in the above Chart have been taken from the Catalogue of Stars of the British Association for the Advancement of Science; and the large numbers placed near a few of the stars, refer to the number in that catalogue: in all the cases of small numbers placed near a star, it is to be understood that the word "Tauri" should follow that number. The Planet's places before Jan. 1 have been taken from its observed places, and, after this day, from the Ephemeris of M. D'Arrest, from Encke's Elements. From more recent observations than those on which Encke's Elements are founded, J. R. Hind, Esq., has computed the following elements:—

The planet is the first that has been discovered since the discovery of Vesta, by Olbers, on the 29th March, 1807; and, in its period, differs but little from those of the four small planets.

It is an exceedingly difficult object to observe—its brightness being about equal to that of a star of the 11th magnitude. On Jan. 1, it was about 135 millions of miles from the earth; on Jan 10, Jan. 20, Jan. 30, Feb 10, Feb. 20, and March 6, its distance from the earth is 140, 148, 157, 167, 176, and 191 millions of miles, respectively. In the Chart it will be seen that it was in the constellation of Taurus when it was discovered, and that it still is in that constellation. Its place in the heavens will immediately be known by finding the star Aldebaran, as explained in the "Illustrated London Almanack," of 1845, in the month of March; and observing its relative position to that star in the diagram.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The Militia.—Our numerous Correspondents who write on the subject of the Militia, are particularly referred to the following declaration made on Monday evening by Mr. Sidney Herbert, the Secretary of War, in reply to a question from Mr. T. Duncombe:—"Mr. S. Herbert said the hon. Member was quite correct in supposing that considerable misapprehension did prevail in the public mind on the subject, which arose from the circumstance of not observing the distinction between 'embodying' and 'training.' The Government had no power to embody the Militia, but it had a power to call them out for training, and beyond that it was not intended to go. It was, however, the intention of Government to bring in a measure for the purpose of consolidating and amending the various Militia Acts, with the view to greater facilities of calling out for training the Militia force, and on that part of the subject he was anxious to say a word with respect to the formation of Militia Clubs, which he understood was being carried on in many parts of the country, and which offered, on certain pecuniary considerations, to guarantee to persons drawn by the ballot, to provide them substitutes. He would recommend to persons engaged in or joining such Clubs, to suspend their proceedings until they were aware of the measures which would be introduced by the Government, which, as related to the mode of raising the Militia force, would be found much less onerous than the present system of the ballot, which the new Act would put an end to. Under these circumstances, he did hope that all parties interested in this subject would suspend their proceedings until they saw what the Government intended to do."

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1846.

The week has been a very calm one, as far as the outward manifestations of feeling in Parliament are concerned. The House has worked but little; and the little it has done, with the exception of the announcement of the proposed change in the Timber Duties, has not been important. But the inaction must not be mistaken for idleness: knowing the fierceness of the struggle that the next week is to commence, to us it appears like the pause before the battle, or "the torrent's smoothness ere it dash below." The interval is anxiously employed, though there may not be much outward appearances of action. Members have to consider the plan of the Premier, and ponder over all it involves; they have to think whether they can support it at all consistently with their own former opinions; and if they can justify the change to themselves, whether they can make the necessity for it equally apparent to their constituents. The double process requires both time and thought—the opinions which have been formed for years are not parted with so easily: all the relations that have been contracted during long connection, as representative and represented, cannot be lightly forgotten.

The past week will have been a memorable one among many constituencies; the announcement of the Ministerial plan has made applications for that mysterious office, the Stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds numerous beyond all precedent. Some of those who approve of the plan, still consider themselves bound by the hustings' declarations of 1841, and have resolved to give their constituents the opportunity of approving or rejecting the new principles in the person of their old but changed representative. Among these are Mr. Dawnay and Lord Ashley; the latter remained in the House merely to introduce his Factory Bill, and then retire, his re-election being of course a contingency. The Legislature seems undecided, the country not quite resolved; it is that painful transition state that always comes between different eras or systems:

> Between the thinking of a dreadful thing
> And the first motion, all the interim is > Like a phantasma, or a hideous dream:
> The genius and the mortal instruments
> Are then in Council, and the state of man,
> Like to a little kingdom, suffers then
> The nature of an insurrection.

We are exactly in such an interval, for, to many, the contemplated change is a "dreadful thing" enough; the "genius," in the person of the Premier, and the "mortal instruments," which consist, in this case, of his Ministry and his party, are holding council together, which appears to be rather the reverse of amicable, for resignations, present and expected, are rife: a Lennox is gone—which was to be anticipated; a Gordon is going, which, we believe, was not; and the meetings in the agricultural districts, to judge from the sentiments expressed, partake pretty much of the "nature of an insurrection" against those to whom full allegiance was formerly given.

The approaching general election, which cannot be deferred, whether the plan be carried or not, gives the constituencies a greater hold over their members, and it will be their own fault if they do not speak out: but of this there is little fear; their leaders are in earnest, and the occasion weighty enough to arouse all their energies.

It would be unfair to judge of the standard of oratorical merit in the American Congress by the abbreviated reports of the speeches delivered on an exciting national question. We know that nearer home speeches are often addressed, less to the audience within the walls than to another and much larger one outside them. The orator speaks not so much to convert others as to win popularity for himself; we are able, therefore, to make great allowance for invective and passionate appeals to national prejudices, and to extend to them a considerable share of that charity which we often stand in need of ourselves. Still we cannot but regret that this virtue has to sustain such heavy demands upon it; we are sorry to see the Americans do so much to bring those satirical sketches which have found their way to Europe so much nearer the truth. The most contemptible farce could not equal many passages in the last debate in Congress; but in their very absurdity there is a sort of hope; such utter destitution of common sense cannot be the characteristic of leading or influential men; if they were in the habit of making such lamentable displays, they could neither gain nor keep any command over the minds of others. We cannot believe that such speeches convince; though less difficult perhaps, it is barely possible to imagine that they inflame, for they are far indeed from proving against England any one act injurious to the interest of the States, and we cannot think a people who know their own interests can be led into a war by mere vapouring. The question is one that very well admits of a wiser mode of settlement, and that we feel assured will be the one finally adopted. But, while it is pending, we regret to see such outbursts of intemperance and folly on a question that on this side of the water is treated with the most perfect moderation, nor to say indifference, by all parties. The Americans complain of the satires that have been published on their nation; we heartily wish they would cease to send us such satires on themselves.

Opinion of the Country upon Sir Robert Peel's Plan.—During the week there have been many meetings, at which opposition for and against to Robert Peel's proposals were elicited. At a meeting at Thirsk on Monday, and at Atherstone on Tuesday, opposition was manifested to them. At Hereford, on Tuesday, there was a meeting in this spirit, which was attended by Earl Somers and the leading agriculturists of the county. A meeting of broad silk hand-loom weavers of Spitalfields and its vicinity took place on Wednesday. It was attended by some of the speakers that the proposition of the Government to reduce the duties upon silk, would tend to reduce the wages of the operatives both in France and England, and would lead to the ruin of the working classes. Resolutions, strongly condemning the reduction of the duties on foreign wrought silks were agreed to, and a petition founded on them was adopted. On the other hand, the Times states that Earl Talbot has signified his intention to give his cordial support to the measures proposed by Sir Robert Peel. The Morning Post mentions rumours of resignations by various individuals who hold office, because of their dislike to the plan. Mr. Colden has written a long letter deprecating any delay in the repeal of the Corn-laws

COURT AND HAUT TON.

Windsor, Thursday Evening. (From our own Correspondent.) A communication reached the Castle this morning from Claremont, stating that her Majesty and the Prince Consort, with the infant Royal Family, may be expected to arrive at Windsor the third week in March; by which period the private apartments have been commanded to be prepared for the reception of the Court.

His Majesty's Return to the Isle of Wight.—It is now said that her Majesty and Prince Albert will not return to Osborne House until the 25th inst. A telegraphic is to be erected on some high land near Osborne House, which will enable her Majesty to signalise the semaphore in Portsmouth Dockyard.

Return of His Majesty to Town. Her Majesty and Prince Albert, who had been residing at Claremont during the early part of the week returned to Buckingham Palace on Thursday, accompanied by the Royal children.

Sir George Murray. Some alarming rumours have been circulated during the week respecting the health of Sir George Murray. We are happy to state, however, that Sir George is now much better. Very numerous inquiries have been made during the week, and the Duke of Wellington visited him on Thursday

New Lord in Waiting on her Majesty.—Lord Glenlyon has been appointed one of the Lords in Waiting in Ordinary to her Majesty, in the room of the Earl of Hardwicke, who recently resigned that office.

Aristocratic Marriage. The marriage of Viscount Carson, son of Earl Howe, with Miss Harriet Mary Sturt, second daughter of Mr. H. C. and Lady Charlotte Sturt, and niece of the Earl of Cardigan, took place on Tuesday morning, at the Church of St. Mary, Bryanstone-square, in the presence of a select circle of friends of both families

POSTSCRIPT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

The Report of the Railway Committee.—The Earl of Dalhousie moved the adoption of the Report of the Select Committee appointed to consider the mode in which this House shall deal with railway bills during the present session, and also the consideration of Standing Order No 224, with a view to its amendment. The noble Earl, after a short statement of the proceedings of the Committee, said the result of their deliberation had been a recommendation to alter the Standing Order to which he referred. A committee of the other House had recommended that, during the present session, a certain portion of the railway bills should commence in their Lordships' House. Amongst these were the Irish railway bills. But a difficulty arose with respect to the amount of deposit. The object of the alteration in the Standing Order was to meet that difficulty, and the Committee recommended that no bill should be entertained unless 5 per cent. on the subscribed capital should be deposited previous to the 6th Feb, and that no such bill should be read a third time, until the remaining 5 per cent. should be paid, making in the whole the 10 per cent. required by their lordships. With respect to the other class of bills, those which were considered as competing bills, the Committee had not yet been able to come to any decision After a few words from the Earl of Stradbroke, the motion was agreed to Lord Denman brought in a bill to give the Courts of Law power to mitigate penalties in criminal cases, which was read a first time.

Lord Beaumont gave notice of a motion for next week for a select committee to consider the peculiar burden on landed property, &c

Their Lordships then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

This being the last day for receiving petitions for private bills, a large number, principally for railway bills, were presented.

New Writ.—Lord Rendlesham moved for a new writ for the Eastern Division of the county of Suffolk, in the room of Lord Henniker, who has accepted the Stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds.

Railway Committee Report.—Lord G. Somerset called attention to the first report of the Railways Committee, and said that he quite agreed in the recommendation of the Committee, to give increased facilities to Irish Railway Bills.—Mr. French said the only boon that could have been acceded to railways, was overlooked—that of allowing the proofs of notices, &c., adduced in one House of Parliament to be received as evidence in the other.—Mr. Bernal thought great injustice fell on the public at large by giving this preference to the Irish over English and Scotch railways. He believed the capital paid in the shape of deposits on English railways alone amounted to eleven millions and a half, and it would be unjust to those gentlemen to give a preference to others. That ought not to have been to reduce the enormous expences attending the passing of those bills through the House. The O'Connor Don said, it was impossible to give satisfaction to every one, but the conclusion both of the Lords and Commons were of opinion that it was of high importance that they should give every facility to Irish railways, in order to afford employment to the people of Ireland at a time when it was highly probable that there would be a scarcity of provisions in that country. Mr. Ashley contended that it should be optional with the railway bills to go into the House of Lords or not, as they might think proper.—Sir G. Clerk said that, in that case, two competing lines might go on at the same time, one in the Lords and the other in the Commons, which would lead to the greatest inconvenience.

After a desultory discussion, the report was agreed to.

In answer to a question from Mr. Labouchere, Sir R. Peel said that the Brazilian Government had not yet carried out the discriminating duties of which they had for some years given notice, nor was the Government in possession of any information that it was likely to do so.

Sir R. Peel's Commercial Changes. Mr. P. Miles gave notice that it was the intention of the party with whom he acted to give a direct negative to Sir R. Peel's proposals, on Monday next

The House adjourned at seven o'clock

The Railway Deposits.—Yesterday (Friday) was the last day for paying railway deposits into the Accountant-General's Office. We have reason to believe that the amount paid in exceeds eleven millions.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

France.—We find, by the latest Paris papers, that the French Ministry have gained another triumph in the Chamber, having defeated an amendment on the Eight-o'clock question by a majority of seventy-three, with a full House. Thus, the absurd procrastination by the Opposition of the discussion on the Address has had no other effect than a series of defeats of the party. On Wednesday the Chamber adopted the 6th paragraph of the Address, relative to the convention of the 29th of August, 1845, for the repression of the slave trade. The debate afterwards turned on the 7th paragraph, in which the Chamber expressed a hope that the combined action of England and France would stop the effusion of blood and restore peace to the banks of the Plata. The Constitutionnel makes an important announcement "if true." It states that the Ministry, moved to action by the economical reforms proposed by Sir Robert Peel, are preparing important modifications of the tariff. This would, indeed, be a most beneficial and influential result of commercial relaxation.

EPITOME OF NEWS.—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

According to a letter from Treibisond, of the 26th ult., frightful storms have raged in the Black Sea. Upwards of twenty ships, laden with corn, from Taganrock and Kertch have been lost on the coast of Circassia. They were bound for the coast of Anatolia, the population of which country are suffering from dearth. Even the ships in the port of Trebisond were not in perfect safety.

The King and the Royal Prince of Hanover are quite recovered from their recent indisposition, both his Majesty and the Prince being at present enabled to take their usual carriage drives and exercise.

Letters from Berlin state that the Customs Union is contemplating an important measure. Its to transform Germany into a Customs Union of the Zollverein. The result of this measure will be not only to draw closer the bonds which exist between the several states of the union, but will lead necessarily to a wiser direction of foreign agencies, without speaking of the suppression of a crowd of posts which will be rendered useless.

A Rennes journal states that a slight shock of an earthquake was felt in that town on the night of the 24th ult.

Prince Jules de Polignac, President of the Council of the last Ministry of Charles X has lately purchased a charming house at Versailles. Prince de Polignac had been allowed to reside at St. Germains, but easily obtained this change of residence. He now inhabits the house which he has just bought.

Letters from Berlin, January 21, say that an attempt had been made in the Grand Duchy of Posen to seize the gates of Grandentz, and deliver the prisoners kept there; but the attempt has failed. Numerous arrests have taken place.

A few days ago a meteor, which commenced in the canton of Pierre, in La Bresse-Loubannaise (France), after having passed over a space of two leagues, fell on a farmhouse in the village of Lacuisse, and burnt it down, with all the cattle and produce of the harvest.

We read in a letter from Guadaloupe, of the 23rd ult.:—"The earth is again beginning to quake. On the 17th, at seven in the morning, we had two short but very sharp shocks, if they had lasted a little longer we should have had another 8th of February. They were the strongest shocks we have had since the earthquake. The whole body was much alarmed. Some of the prisons are cracked, and those of the barracks are injured. On the 19th there were some slight shocks, but no injury was done.

The Univers announces that the Pope, at a Consistory held at the Vatican on the 18th ult., had elevated to the dignity of Cardinal the Patriarch of Lisbon, the Archbishop of Naples, and the Archbishop of Aix.

Muller, who was accused of the murder of M. Leu, was tried at Lucerne on the 24th ult. The trial lasted only four hours and a half, at the expiration of which time he was found guilty and condemned to death. His counsel attributed the crime to religious fanaticism. The prisoner himself said, that having been denounced for rebellion, and his apprehension to be interrogated being refused, he had conceived a profound resentment against M. Leu, and could not subdue the desire for vengeance.

A letter from Stockholm of the 15th of January states, that in the provinces of Upsal, Stockholmian, and Westmanland, the scarcity has reached such a degree of intensity that it is feared generally lest a mass of unfortunate persons rush to Stockholm, which would inevitably produce a famine. In Upsal there are 14,000 persons without food or shelter.

The German papers state that the Rhine is considerably swollen by the late rains. At Cologne, on the 27th ult., the Bridge of Boats was removed. In the course of the morning a number of persons, in search of employment, had placed in a boat, which rowed up to the middle of the street adjoining the bridge before they were safely landed.

The theatre at Avignon, in the south of France, was destroyed by fire on the 26th ult. There is now nothing remaining of this once elegant, and somewhat recently erected, building but the four walls. The work of ruin was swift indeed. As is generally the case, the disaster is attributed to some evil-minded individual; but, in truth, no clue whatever has been afforded hitherto for the discovery of the fire's origin. Such was the violence and rapidity with which the flames traveled, that the porter, who was at supper in the theatre, was unable to reach the door. His body was afterwards found burnt to a cinder.

Letters from Leghorn, of the 25th ult., state that the Pontifical Government apprehended another movement in Romagna. The political prisoners confined in the Castellana having attempted to escape, the guards were obliged to make use of their arms, and killed and wounded several of them. At Imola, a detachment of carabineers and Swiss at Lugo, having met in the streets a band of young men singing patriotic songs, fired upon them, and killed two and wounded some others. Much agitation had prevailed at Forli since the murder of the commissary of police of that town.

On the 24th ult., the anniversary of the birth of Frederick the Great, the King of Prussia gave a grand dinner at Berlin to the Knights of the Order of Merit in the Arts and Sciences then in that city.

The Pope has, it is said, refused to interfere in favour of Russia, relative to the projected marriage of the Archduke Stephen with the Princess Olga.

A Vienna journal of the 24th ult., states that a sharp shock of earthquake, which lasted two seconds but did no damage, was felt in that city on the preceding day.

METROPOLITAN NEWS

METROPOLITAN PETITIONS FOR THE REPEAL OF THE CORN-LAWS.—A petition to the House of Commons from the inhabitants of Westminster, approving the Premier's approximation to the principles of Free-Trade, but praying for immediate and total repeal, has been prepared, and in the course of Monday ... ceived upwards of 6000 signatures. In the course of the same day thousands of individuals signed the "City Petition for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn-laws," which lay in various parts of the metropolis, ready for signature, for the first time. The substance of both petitions is total and immediate repeal.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE METROPOLIS.—The Commissioners for improving the Metropolis have presented their fifth report; they recommend the formation of a park on the present site of Battersea Fields, in connection with a bridge over the Thames in the same locality, and with the embankment of the Northern shore of the river, which formed the subject of their second report.

MORTALITY IN THE METROPOLIS.—The number of deaths during the last week was 901, being four eighths of the 7000 annual week, and 179 below the average of five winters. Bronchitis is almost the only disease more fatal than usual. The number was 63, while the average is 31. The violent deaths were 18, of which six were suicide ...

ELECTION FOR THE CITY OF CORK.—Last Saturday Mr. Alexander M'Carthy was elected for Cork, without opposition. Mr. M'Carthy is a Repealer, and a member of the Irish Bar.

ANOTHER MURDER IN TIPPERARY.—A man was found murdered on Thursday (last week) in a grove near Borrisokane. His offence against the "code," accord ing to the Tipperary Vindicator, consisted in his having "processed some persons for debt at the last quarter sessions." Neither the victim's name nor any further particulars are furnished. A letter written from the scene of the murder, states that the illiterate man's name was Madden, and that he was shot in a plantation belonging to a gentleman named Stacpoole, residing at Portland, near Borrisokane.

ANOTHER MURDER.—A most barbarous and unprovoked murder was committed near Shrule on the 20th ult. The victim was a poor unoffending man, who was returning from the market of Headford, where he had been to purchase a few articles for his family, consisting of six small children. He was attacked at a short distance from the town by five or six men, who beat him so severely that he died on the following Thursday. An inquest has been held on the body, and was adjourned to Thursday. It appears from the evidence given before the Coroner, that the party who committed the murder were told that some of their friends were beaten by another party, when they hastened in the direction for the purpose of taking vengeance, and this poor man being the first they met they murdered him without any provocation whatever. One or two other persons are lying ill, in dangerous state from wounds inflicted by the same party.

PROGRESS OF THE POTATO DISEASE.—The Cork Examiner says:—"With the deepest sorrow we are compelled to state that the potato disease is spreading its ravages most fearfully, and that fever is making its dread appearance in every locality affected by the blight of the people's food. We have had a conversation with a respected clergyman from Aghada, who gave us a terrible and heart-rending account of the spread of fever among the poor, and of the almost total destruction of their only food."

The 60th Foot having two battalions, the addition will be confined to the second battalion. Sixteen Regiments of cavalry will be increased four men per troop, 640. Thus giving a total for the horse and foot, of 13,528.

DEATH OF REAR ADMIRAL ROWLEY.—Rear Admiral of the Red squadron Samuel Campbell Rowley, of Mount Campbell, Lanarkshire, died at Kilkenny, last week, at the advanced age of 70. He entered the navy when only nine years old, was made a Lieutenant in 1794, and in that year, in the Vanguard, served on shore at the taking of the West India Islands. He was in the Astræa at the capture of the French frigate La Loire, after an action of 50 minutes' duration, and was present in Lord Bridport's action in 1795. He was made a commander in 1799, commanded the Terror, bomb-vessel, at Copenhagen, in 1801, and obtained his post rank in the following year. He reached his flagpromotion in 1837.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

TRIAL OF CAPTAIN JOHNSTONE FOR THE MURDER ON BOARD THE SHIP TORY.

On Thursday George Johnstone, formerly captain of the ship Tory, whose case has excited such extraordinary interest, was placed at the bar before Mr. Justice Williams and Mr. Justice Cresswell, on an indictment charging him with the murder of Thomas Reason. There were other indictments, but the charge, in the first instance, was confined to the murder of Reason.

The Attorney-General, Sir John Dodson, and Mr. Clerk, were for the prosecution; Mr. Serjeant Wilkins and Mr Huddlestone appeared for the defence

The prisoner, who seemed in a better state of health than when he appeared before the magistrate at the Thames Police-court, was attentive to what passed, and seemed desirous that the proceedings should receive particular attention to the evidence, more especially where it seemed to go against himself. He is not by any means a man of unprepossessing appearance

The Attorney-General opened the case, and stated the facts as they have been already pub lished.

Arthur Gilmore Spence was the first witness called, and was examined by Mr. Hodgkin. He was on board the ship Tory on her voyage from Hong-Kong to England. She belonged to Liverpool, and I was apprentice on board. The prisoner was captain of her, and the crew consisted, on an average, of 21. No complaints were given against the steward's conduct.

The prisoner's conduct to his people required

The Art-Union Prize Cartoon.

In our Journal for the 17th ult., we announced that the Art-Union of London having offered a prize of £500 for the best Cartoon of an historical subject, and the picture to be painted from it, twenty-eight artists had responded to the call: and their productions were, accordingly, exhibited to the Art-Union Subscribers.

The Committee have since awarded the Prize of £500 to No. 10—"Queen Philippa interceding for the Burgesses of Calais," by Mr. Selous. This distinction was predicted by several critics. The entire scene is a fine composition; and the award has given general satisfaction.

Mr. Selous has since produced specimens of his work as a painter; and with these the Committee of the Art-Union are fully satisfied.

Her Majesty's Pavilion, in Buckingham Palace Gardens.

We have just received a copy of Mr. Gruner's illustrated Description of the Decorations of the Garden-Pavilion in the grounds of Buckingham Palace. The origin of the work is thus described by Mr. Gruner, in an introductory note: "After the execution of most of the Fresco Lunettes in the Octagon Room of the Garden Pavilion, I was honoured by the gracious commands of Her Majesty and His Royal Highness Prince Albert to present designs for the completion and decoration of the three rooms of which the Summer-house consists; and I was also directed to procure the execution of these designs. Since the completion of these works, her Majesty has been graciously pleased to direct that they should be engraved and published." Accordingly, we have in the work before us fifteen plates illustrative of the several designs, with a letter-press Introduction, from the accomplished pen of Mrs. Jameson.

THE GARDEN PAVILION IN THE GROUNDS OF BUCKINGHAM PALACE.

The reader need scarcely be reminded that the building of this Pavilion originated in the revival of Fresco-Painting in this country; when it occurred to Her Majesty and Prince Albert that "it would be well to have the experiment made upon a small scale, yet under circumstances which might lend it more than common interest, and at the same time offer to some of our artists at once a high motive and a fair opportunity to try their powers in this new old method. The idea was surely a happy one; and not the less seasonable that every one who had considered the subject (at least every one who understood it), felt that it was a method which presented particular difficulties to some of the ablest and most distinguished of our painters, whose habitual style of execution, whose aim in point of treatment of their subject and effect, had been precisely the reverse of what is required in Fresco.

"A small Pavilion, or Summer-house, in the grounds behind Buckingham Palace, was selected by her Majesty as the locality in which this interesting experiment was to be tried. It may be remembered that some of the most beautiful examples of Italian decorative art are to be found in Garden-houses and the appendages to Villas, and that some of the most celebrated compositions in the world were decorative pictures. Raphael's 'Galatea,' for instance, is on the wall of the Villa Farnesina. Guido's "Aurora" is on the ceiling of a Summer-house, in the gardens of Rospigliosi Palace.

"It is, perhaps, to be regretted that this little Pavilion, originally intended only for a simple cottage, was not constructed for the purpose of being thus distinguished. There were certain disadvantages and difficulties, arising out of the original construction, which had to be overcome, and some that could never be wholly conquered; but, at length, after successive alterations, it assumed its present form. It is a small edifice, on the summit of an eminence, overlooking the piece of water. The external appearance is picturesque and fantastic, without any regular style of architecture."

Thus far, the exterior, of which we annex a view from the west, copied, by permission, from the vignette to Mr. Gruner's work. Hereafter, we shall illustrate the interior, from the same accredited source. Meanwhile, we specially commend Mr. Gruner's Embellished Account of the Experiment to every lover of Decorative Art.

The Borough of Tamworth and Sir Robert Peel.

An adjourned meeting of the landowners and farmers of Tamworth was held on Saturday last at the Town Hall, to take into consideration the proposals of Sir Robert Peel. H. J. Pye, Esq., of Clifton Hall, who was in the chair, said he knew that Sir Robert Peel possessed very great powers of language, and that he was very capable of making the best that could be made of a bad cause; but in his (Mr. Pye's) opinion he had failed in his attempt to satisfy the country that he was right in changing his opinions. He had endeavoured to analyse the speech, and to arrive at the facts which it contained, and he confessed he saw little in them to satisfy him. The Chairman proceeded to contend that Sir Robert Peel had been guilty of great inconsistency upon several great public questions. A resolution was then proposed and agreed to, strongly condemning the proposed alterations in the protection laws.

Mr. Parsons, who moved the second resolution, remarked that it was very customary with Sir Robert Peel to say, when in the House of Commons, "These are my measures, and if you do not like them I will resign." He (Mr. P.) wished that the right hon. Baronet would write a letter to that effect to his constituents. (Loud cheers.) He for one should be most happy to receive his resignation, and if twenty influential voters in that borough would join him, he should most gladly ask him to resign. He would not leave it to Sir Robert Peel to come down to Tamworth to tell them "These are my measures, and if you do not like them I will resign." No, he would join any twenty men at once in a letter to the right hon. Baronet, and request him to give them an opportunity of electing another in his place. He therefore called upon all in that room, and all the electors throughout the kingdom, if there should be a general election, to be up and ready for the contest.

A petition to the Queen was adopted, praying her Majesty to dissolve the Parliament.

A resolution was then unanimously adopted, "That this meeting is of opinion that Sir Robert Peel has, by the proposal of such measures, justly forfeited all claim to public confidence, he having abandoned all his former principles, opinions, and pledges, on the strength of which he obtained his present position; and this meeting strongly recommends the electors of Tamworth to call upon him to render back into their hands that trust he has so greatly abused, and calls upon all the friends of native industry, and every true lover of his country, to join in a subscription to promote the return of a sound and confidential man to represent that borough in Parliament, in place of the right hon. Baronet."

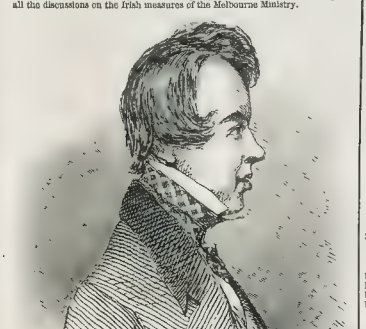
WEST RIDING ELECTION.—LORD MORPETH, M.P.

Lord Morpeth was, on Wednesday, returned for this division of Yorkshire, without opposition. The nomination took place at Wakefield. The noble Lord was proposed by Mr. Fawkes, and the nomination was seconded by Mr. Marshall, of Leeds

Lord Morpeth addressed the assemblage, which consisted of about 8,000 persons. He expressed himself gratified at the proud position he now occupied, contrasted with his defeat in 1841. He had not canvassed, he had not solicited the honour of representing them on the present occasion, and he was unopposed. (Cheers.) Not that there had been no rumours of opposition; there had been plenty of blowing of trumpets, and of braying too. (Laughter.) Mr. Archer Gurney had been to Wakefield, and called a meeting, which was attended by seven reporters, and four protectionists. (A laugh.) But that gentleman had retired to his sequestered house, in Rockvale, Devonshire. (Hear, hear, and laughter.) Next came one who spoke in harsher terms, but who was not so much a candidate himself, as a godfather of candidates. The first object of his affections, however, chose to go and fight the battle of protection in the borough of Ripon; and the other object of Mr. Ferrand's tender regard was too ill to perform the duties of High Sheriff of the county, much less was he able, therefore, to discharge those of a representative of the West Riding, and he had declined to contest the vacant seat. (Hear, hear.) He should go into the House of Commons to vote for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn-laws. (Cheers.) The noble Lord attributed the present position of the Corn-law question to the League and the exertions of its leaders (cheers); and though he did not think that large self-constituted bodies were the most desirable methods for working out legislative measures, yet questions of such importance might arise as to compel objectionable modes even for overcoming the obstinacy of the resistance with which they were met. (Hear, hear.)

The Under Sheriff then took a show of hands. Nearly every person present held up his hand in favour of the return of the noble Lord; but about a dozen held up against him. The Under Sheriff declared his Lordship to have been duly elected; and, after the usual formalities, the meeting dispersed.

Lord Morpeth will be warmly welcomed back to his old position in the House, for, personally, he is much respected by all parties. He belongs to one of the noblest families in the kingdom—the Howards; and, by marriage, is connected with the Houses of Rutland, Cawdor, Durham, Stafford, &c. But not on his high rank alone has his Lordship raised for influence; his excellent talents he has both improved and used: few men ever exercised the difficult office of Secretary for Ireland with so much ability as Lord Morpeth, and he bore the chief weight of all the discussions on the Irish measures of the Melbourne Ministry.



LORD MORPETH, M.P. FOR THE WEST RIDING OF YORKSHIRE.

His family name is George William Frederick Howard: he is the eldest son of the Earl of Carlisle, and grandson of that Earl who found no troublesome a ward in Lord Byron from whom he received a prominent place in the "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers." The poet, however, lived long enough to repent and regret the attack.

Lord Morpeth distinguished himself at Oxford, entered Parliament young, and attached himself to the Liberal party.

In Yorkshire, which he so long represented, he has always been very popular; and when he was defeated in the Election of 1841, he refused to sit for any other constituency. During his retirement from political life, consequent on this occurrence, the noble Lord made a tour in America, where his affability and simplicity of manner won him the good opinion of all those with whom he came in contact. On the death of Lord Wharncliffe, a vacancy occurred in the representation of the West Riding; and, without either canvass or address, Lord Morpeth has been again returned for that important district, without opposition.

ARCHÆOLOGICAL INSTITUTE OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

The second meeting of the Committee for the Exhibition of Antiquities, and for Archæological Discussion, was held on Friday last, at the apartments of the Institute, 14, Haymarket, Sir R. Westmacott, R.A., in the chair. The names of the following Honorary Foreign Members were announced: Mr. Wetherell, of Seville; Dr. Morton, of Philadelphia; M. Guizot, M. M. Cousin, Mignet, Barthelemy, St. Hilaire. Sixteen subscribing and nine corresponding Members were enrolled

Among several very interesting communications were the following:—A letter was read from Mr Edward Richardson, the sculptor, giving an account of further excavations on the site of the Priory at Lewes: a deep pit full of human bones, among which were fragments of garments, leather, a spur, &c.—the remains apparently of the slain in the great battle of Lewes. The graves were constructed of pieces of stone or chalk, two or three inches thick Every care has been taken of the antiquities found by a local committee on the spot. Major-General Sir J. Woodford, K.C.B., communicated the discovery of a gold ring with a cabalistic inscription, dug up on the field of the battle of Agincourt, where, some years since, he made extensive researches. Sir R. Westmacott exhibited two beautiful specimens of silversmiths' work of the 17th century, designed in the style of the Florentine artists, in which the human figure is combined with foliage They were found with a qua...y of human bones, woollen cloths, &c., in an excavation in Berwick-street, were probably buried in that spot during the great plague.

Mr. J. W. Burgon exhibited a Roman brick found in making the foundations of the Post-office, St. Martin's-le-Grand, inscribed LON. The word LON occurs on the coins of Constantine and other late Emperors, and has been considered by numismatists to indicate LONdonium as the place of mintage. This brick, therefore, is probably stamped in like manner, with the name of the place of manufacture, London

A communication was read from Mr. Squier, of Cincinnati, in America, relative to the Mounds or Earthworks of the Valley of the Mississippi, in which the writer gave reasons for his opinion that they were in many cases not sepulchral, that they were the work of a race long anterior to the modern Indian tribes, and very much more advanced in art and civilisation, as appeared from the constructive skill displayed in their mounds and military outworks and the fashion of their implements and pottery. He considered it probable that this race descended southward through the great continent of America till they finally settled in the fertile territory of Mexico. An interesting discussion followed between Mr. Talbot and Mr. Birch on the subject of these remarks.

Among the principal antiquities exhibited were a most interesting series of Celtic remains, from the extensive collection of Mr. Whincopp, of Woodbridge, consisting chiefly of objects discovered in the Eastern Counties. Mr. Alexander Nesbit examined and read an account of Four Churches, in Norfolk, which from some peculiarities of structure and materials, he considered to be probably specimens of Saxon architecture.

A letter was read from the Rev. H. Longueville Jones, Local Secretary, giving a report of the excavations now actively carried on the site of the ancient Segontium, and stated that the subscription in aid of this object had been much encouraged by the donation of £5 from the Institute.

HIGH TIDES AND FLOODS IN THE COUNTRY. The provincial papers in the west of England state that great damage has been done by an extraordinary high tide on Thursday (last week), and the heavy rains which swelled the currents of the rivers running into the sea, and meeting the high tide, overflowed the banks and inundated the country. The sheep have suffered to a great extent; and it is estimated that at Combewick, a few miles from Bridgewater, nearly 1000 were destroyed. At Ilfracombe the damage done by loss of live stock will exceed £300, and all along the northern coast of Somersetshire and of South Wales very serious injury has been done. Happily, however, no lives appear to have been lost.

SCENE FROM THE NEW OPERA OF "DON QUIXOTE," AT DRURY LANE THEATRE.

SCENE FROM THE OPERA OF "DON QUIXOTE."

FINALE OF THE FIRST ACT.

SCENE.—Spanish Village, with Sierra Morena in the distance. Venta of Rovedos in the foreground, with balcony to Quiteria's chamber. A large stone horse-trough at the extremity of the building.

After Basilius and Quiteria have made Don Quixote fast with garlands to the balcony, the former descend, when Sancho Panza enters in his night cap, with a lamp. Basilius takes off the cap and drops it on the lamp, as an extinguisher, but it catches fire, and Sancho, roaring out fire, is hurled into the water trough by the enraged Basilius, who is thus foiled in carrying off Quiteria.

COVENT GARDEN THEATRE.—M. Jullien's season terminated on Saturday. The Brussels Company, it is now rumoured, will positively come over this season to give performances at this establishment. The second Italian Company will open their campaign in the season 1847: everything has been arranged, and the theatre will be decorated and arranged before the arrival of the performers.

PARLIAMENTARY PORTRAITS.

LORD JOHN MANNERS.

Amongst the Members of the Legislature there are a select few, who, without having ever acted conspicuously together with the concert or the defined objects of political parties, have, however, been called a party, from their having taken up a novel position on many public occasions both in and out of Parliament; and, from a certain concurrence exhibited on their part, in views, which, strangely enough, indicate at once both a strong leaning towards the old aristocratic notions and doctrines of times long past, and a tendency to adopt many of the liberal and enlightened ideas and opinions on politics which have sprung up and become so quickly developed in England during the last quarter of a century. This small body of public men have been designated by the title of the "Young England Party;" and most prominently amongst them, by reason as well of his exalted rank as of his personal and mental endowments, stands the noble Member for Newark, the subject of the present sketch

Lord John James Robert Manners is son of the Duke of Rutland, and was born in 1818, and is, consequently, at the present time, in his eight-and-twentieth year for the borough of Newark, on Conservative principles, and, since that period, has been, both in the House and out, pretty frequently before the public.

As a speaker, he appears more the accomplished scholar and gentleman than the clever ready debater. His personal appearance is eminently prepossessing. He is tall, and elegantly proportioned—

"Of stature far, and slender frame, Bit firmly knit."

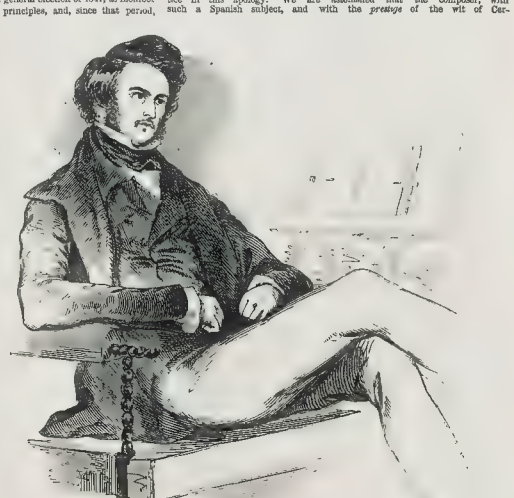
And if the expression of the countenance may be taken as an index of the inner man, then has Nature dealt most favourably by Lord John Manners. His elegantly-chiselled mouth, and short, clement upper lip, and his light olive complexion, shaded by raven black hair, give dignity to the expression of mildness and benevolence which his full, dark, brilliant eyes communicate to his countenance.

He is decidedly a handsome man, and possesses that repose of manner and grace of bearing which so generally indicate the high-bred, cultivated mind. As a politician, though in word and deed a Conservative, he has frequently shown himself open to conviction from the cogent arguments of the Liberals, and, true to his nature, frank and free to admit his change of opinion, which, however, has not been always followed by a change of vote. In his political rule of conduct he seems to refine too much to be too theoretical and not sufficiently practical. He deals with politics as the schoolmen with dialectics, and, while he splits hairs, he appears to forget that it is not with abstract questions the Parliamentary man has to deal, but with stern reality and the vital interests of millions of his fellowmen. In the letter which he has recently addressed to his constituents on Sir Robert Peel's commercial scheme there occurs the following characteristic passage:

"While, therefore, for the reasons above stated, I am prepared to resist any essential alteration in the Corn-laws during the present Parliament, I cannot, looking at all the circumstances of the case, the union of nearly all the statesmen of the country on this subject, the means that must be employed if resistance to their joint proposals and the agitation that seconds them is intended to be effective, the uncertainties that must daily increase, the breach that must daily be widened between the different classes of fellow-countrymen I cannot, regarding all this, recommend to them a determined maintenance of the present Corn-laws, nor promise such a line of conduct for myself"



LORD JOHN MANNERS, M.P.

MUSIC.

"DON QUIXOTE," OPERA BUFFA, IN TWO ACTS. MUSIC BY G. A. MACFARREN; DRAMA BY THE LATE GEORGE MACFARREN.

Drury Lane Theatre on Tuesday night was well attended, and the new opera, although opposed in some parts, may be pronounced to be successful. At the close of the first act affairs looked threatening, notwithstanding that the overture and a ballad sung by Mr. Allen had been encored; but two pretty songs of Miss Rainforth and one by the tenor in the last act, turned the scale, and the curtain dropped with the customary ovations to the composer and singers. We wish we could predict a long career of success to this production by a native composer; but, clever as it is, the impression seemed to be that it was too "clever" for the elements of popularity. Not but what Mr. Macfarren has in some degree departed from the dry learning that was anticipated from him; still there was a lack of inspiration, and an absence of marked originality, that caused the opera to drag. The gem will be probably considered to be the song of Miss Rainforth, "Ah! why do we love," in three flats, six-eight measure, a charming conception, deliciously rendered by the fair vocalist. The next favourite will be Allen's ballads, "I quit my pillow, beneath the willow," in E minor, six-eight time, and "Sweet were those hours of infancy" (the latter evidently of Irish origin), in three flats, two-four time. The duettino between Miss Rainforth and Mr. Allen, "Canst thou forego thy plenteous home?" is a pretty trifle. Her rondo finale, "Transporting moment," is commonplace. The air sung by Allen, imitating a woman's voice, "Alas! a thousand secret woes," in the dreary key of A flat minor, was a dead failure, and caused a bad impression. Miss Rainforth's ballad, "Calm those frowning looks," derived its interest from the skill of the singer. A chorus, in four sharps, called a "Seguedilla," but which was anything but Spanish, is pretty, and the taunting chorus of Sancho smacked of the Italian chattering concerted pieces. The sextet, with the stringed instruments pizzicato, was borrowed from Rossini's "Cenerentola," and the overture, albeit nicely scored, was essentially Weberian, not only in form, but in idea

The finales of both acts were on a very ambitious scale, intended, most likely, to follow in the wake of Mozart, but the composer has gone out of his depth. He exhibits skill and elegance in orchestration, but his subjects are vapid and monotonous. Don Quixote's music is alternately made up from Purcell and Handel. Sancho Panza has but one song, "No longer pipe, no longer dance," nine-eight time, of which the least said the better. It has been remarked that Macfarren's music would have told more if there had been a better libretto, and with more effective artists than Weiss and Stretton, who certainly afforded no notion of the chivalric Hidalgo and his trusty Squire. There may be some justice in this apology. We are astonished that the composer, with such a Spanish subject, and with the prestige of the wit of Cervantes, did not give a local colouring to his inspirations, which might as well have been written for a Hottentot drama This want of individuality and identity was a great drawback On the plot it would be useless to dwell. Everybody knows the story of Camacho the Rich, and Basilius the Poor how the f[illegible] was to wed Quiteria the Fair, through the cupidity of her father, Lorenzo. Basilius pretended to stab himself, and was then united to his lady-love, the [illegible] and Camacho consenting under the impression that Basilius was in his last agon how, when the priest had pronounced the nuptial benediction, Basilius jumped up, and was found to be right well and jovial at the success of his manœuvre; how Camacho and his friends, were about to immolate the clever lover; and how Don Quixote valorously interfered, and declaring that stratagem in love was allowed as well as in war, reconciled the conflicting parties. The incidents of tying Don Quixote to Quiteria's balcony after he has stormed the ladder by which the favoured Basilius has ascended, and the trashing of Sancho Panza into the horse-trough, have been adapted in the other portions of Cervantes' masterpiece. Allen and Miss Rainforth, as Basilius and Quiteria, sang and acted admirably. Mr. King walked through Camacho with carelessness and indifference. It is only in England that artists give themselves these airs when sustaining what they deem inferior parts, forgetting that they may raise a character, however trifling, by zeal and attention into importance Mr. Weiss' plaque was capital for the facial portrait of the facetious [illegible] but he had no dramatic skill, and his fine voice failed always, except in the level passages Mr. Stretton's Sancho was a deplorable exhibition.

DRURY LANE THEATRE.

On Thursday night was given "Mariana," for the fiftieth time, and it was gracefully appropriated by the lessee to the benefit of Mr. Wallace, its highly gifted composer, who for the occasion displayed his great powers as a pianist He performed a fantasia of his own composition, called "La Cracovienne," taking the popular dance of that name as his theme, and treating it in a series of ingenious variations with a skill and precision, which called forth the plaudits of the orchestra as well as of the audience. His touch is beautiful, and his execution included the peculiar tours de force of the modern school. His mastery of octaves and tenths, and his facility of carrying on the subject with one hand, whilst he was rattling forth brilliant passages with the other, were quite marvellous. His left-hand introduction was a study of itself. Mr. Salmon, the celebrated violinist, executed De Beriot's trying and difficult Tremolo, arranged from Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata. His precision, vigour, delicacy, expression, and perfect intonation, place him in the highest rank of violinists [illegible] His tone is amazingly full, and thoroughly [illegible] He was much applauded after his magnificent rendering of the Tremolo

Signor Marras, the tenor, sang a c[illegible]tina, "Sonza dal Ciel" (by Mr. Wallace, we believe), and Donizetti's Serenade from "Pasquale." He has a perfect style of vocalization almost too refined for a music-lacuna audience. Miss Rainforth sang "Auld Robin Gray" with great success. This agreeable little concert took place after the opera, which went off with infinite spirit.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY

Handel's oratorio of "Samson," which is only second to his "Messiah," the composer himself not knowing to which to give the preference, was performed last night for the first time since the season of 1842. The music for "Samson" is most difficult for a tenor, but Braham achieved one of his greatest triumphs. He was in splendid voice. In the first part he gave the "Total Eclipse" with a power and pathos worthy of his best days. In the most abstruse air, "Why does the God of Israel sleep," his execution of the trying divisions was marvellous. In the duet in the second part he electrified the auditory by his energy in the duet. "Go, baffled coward," in which he certainly unobtained poor Lablache. No less effective was his delivery of the air, "Thus when the Sun," in the last part. It was altogether a most extraordinary exhibition of vocalization from a man of his age, completely beating out of the field the modern race of tenors. The chorus, "Then round about the Starry Throne," was encored.

Miss Birch, Miss Hawes, and Mr. Phillips acquitted themselves with their customary ability. Miss Birch created a sensation, being her first appearance since her return from Italy. The choral singers did their duty well, and the oratorio will be repeated in consequence of its triumphant reception.

MADAME DULCKEN'S SOIREES

The second concert afforded the gratification of hearing Miss Dolby, after her return from Leipsic, where she has been singing with great success, at the Subscription performances, conducted by Mendelssohn. Her reception was heartily welcomed, and sang Pacsiello's aria, "Ho perduto," in charming style. The instrumental selection comprised Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in C Major, and his Sonata in G, for piano and violin, finely played by Madame Dulcken and Signor Sivori; Mozart's Quintuor in D, and Mendelssohn's Trio in D Minor, for piano, violin, and violoncello, executed by Madame Dulcken, Sivori, and Lucas. The next concert is on the 18th inst.

MR. HENRY RUSSELL'S ENTERTAINMENT.

This popular vocalist re-appeared last Monday evening at Miss Kelly's Theatre, in Dean-street, and was warmly greeted by a numerous audience. The room was encored in nearly all his serious songs, substituting each time a comic ditty. He also introduced a new composition, the words by Charles Mackay "Little Fools and Great Fools" quaintly and pathetically set by Mr. Russell's great genius are the "Gamblet's Wife," and the "Maniac." He displays dramatic power of a high order, that causes regret at his manifold qualicities. He is a brilliant accompanyist; and there can be no question he might have occupied higher ground in musical art: but as he achieved fame and financial success by his own course of action, he can afford to laugh at the sneers and criticism of the legitimates. It is really astonishing what effects he can produce on audiences, although his voice is of a very inferior quality.

THE SINGING CLASSES.

A great assemblage of the supporters of the Wilhelm method of teaching singing took place on Wednesday night at Exeter Hall, to aid Mr. Hullah to raise funds for the erection of a building, where his system may be fully carried out These classes, although they cannot create effective vocalists, are useful, because they afford a rational mode of amusement at a cheap rate to the operatives, and at the same time, by enabling them to read music, to prepare them for a more advanced mode of tuition if their means permit. Gradually, it is to be hoped that music will form a portion of national education, as in Germany, and thus eradicate many vicious habits of the working classes. It is, of course, now evident that the Wilhelm system is merely preparatory. No art is more difficult to teach than that of pure vocalisation, and it exacts absolutely the assistance of an efficient master.

Mr. E. C. May conducted the Concert, which was divided into two parts, the first consisting of sacred works, and the latter of secular. The hymn of Tallis, "Glory to Thee, my God;" the motet of Palestrina, "Let the people praise Thee;" the motet of Zingarelli, "Go not from Me;" Dr. Croft's fine anthem, "God is gone up," were the prominent items in the sacred school. MacMurdie's canon, "Quis est Rex" and Hullah's Hymn were heavy and uninteligible. A fabulous morsel by Haydn, "O, remember, Lord of Heaven," was quite Spohrish in character, but it was murdered in the execution

Of the secular glees, songs, Wilbye's Madrigals "Sweet Honey sucking Bees" and "Dear Fly" the splendid glees of Stevens "Come Shepherd Swain" and "Sigh no more, Ladies;" Webbe's graceful glee, "My Voice, O Harmony," and Horsley's fine glee, "Cold is Cadwallo's Tongue," were the most attractive. Moscheles' part song "Daybreak," is dry and quite unvocal, but the encore demanded for it provoked great opposition. The executants were, at times, very unsteady The bad intonation was pretty palpable throughout. On the whole, the singing of our choristers of the county may be safely pronounced to be superior to the specimen afforded by the Hullahites. Mr. W. Seguin, a base of some reputation, took the soli in Crotch's motet. "Methinks I Hear," and in Horsley's glee. We need scarcely explain that Seguin is not allowed in the Singing Class, although a person sitting near us was quoting him as a proof of the wonderful efficiency of the system!!

MR. DANDO'S QUARTET CONCERTS

Mr. Dando, the violinist, has commenced his series of instrumental performances for the season, at the Throne Room, Crosby Hall. He is patronised strongly by the intelligent City amateurs. His programme included Weber's pianoforte quartet in E flat, the piano part admirably played by Mrs. Anderson; Haydn's quartet in F No. 82; Beethoven's in G No. 2, and Spohr's first double quartet in D minor. The executants were Dando, Guynemer, Gattie, Goffrie, Hill, Lindley, and C. Severn. Miss Birch sang an air by Lindpaintner, and Meyerbeer's "Valentine," from "Robert le Diable," with great effect. Mr. W. H. Holmes was the accompanyist.

MUSICAL CHIT CHAT.

Moscheles had been appointed Assistant Conductor to Mendelssohn at the Birmingham Musical Festival. The former, at the end of this season, leaves this country for Leipsic, to spend the fortune he has acquired here by teaching. He has been appointed superintendent of the studies of advanced pupils on the piano, in the Leipsic Conservatorio.

Mr Wilsen has departed for two months for the north of Scotland to give his concert[illegible]

Mr. C. H[illegible]son gave his "Lays and Legends of Normandy," with great success on Monday last, at Crosby Ha

Mr Lucas's Musical Evenings commence on Thursday next. On Monday is the first [illegible]ncert of the "British Musicians," and the monster concert at Covent Garden On Tuesday, the E[illegible] St James's Theatre.

Mr de[illegible]'s opera on the [illegible]s to be called the "Man of the Mountain," [illegible]ld will be produced at Drury-L[illegible]heatre near the end of this month. Mr. Barnett's ballet of "The [illegible] Maria as the heroine, will be brought out next week

Her Majesty's Theatre.—We have as yet no prospectus from the Manager, as to the ensuing season. The correspondence between him and Signor Costa seems to a close. The general feeling as to the unusual of the latter appears to be one of the greatest regret, and an impression prevails that the published letters do not disclose the real grounds of separation. Into the dispute we shall not pause; but, in connexion with every independent amateur—and, we may add, the entire musical profession—we cannot but lament that the unrivalled orchestra, created by his great intelligence, tact, and perseverance, should lose the presence of the master-mind, who has been for years labouring to render it what it was. M. Costa for he has been naturalized since he has entered into the service of our most gracious Queen retires with the warmest sympathies of Royalty, rank, and fashion, gained, not merely by his musical genius, but by his gentleman-like conduct, unimpeached integrity, and uncompromising independence. The moral weight exercised by such an able, as well as honest man, over the members of the [illegible] contributed, in no small degree, to his orchestra triumphs. He was always faithful to them; he was their champion, as well as conductor; and the hard-worked instrumentalist, whose existence in this country is dependent on the profits of a season, knew that, while Costa wielded the bâton, his earnings were secure from reduction, and his valuable time was not occupied unnecessarily, so as to deprive him from adding to his income by other means.

Continental Musical News.—Leon Pillet, the director of the Parisian Académie Royale, has departed for Italy to look for singers. Duprez had been singing gloriously in the "Guerriere," "Huguenots," &c. Mademoiselle Nau was about to appear in the French version of "Lucia," Duprez sustaining Edgar, written expressly for him by Donizetti. On Wednesday, at the Salle Favart, was produced the new one-act opera of "Les Mousquetaires de la Reine," made by Halévy, libretto by M. de St. Georges. An emeute took place at the Italian Opera, in consequences of the "Sonnambula" being substituted for the "Matrimonio," the patriarch Lablache being ill. The commissioner of police and M. Vatel, the manager, had to address the meeting before peace was restored. Balfe's opera of "The Bohemian Girl" is to be produced in Vienna.

THE THEATRES.

HAYMARKET.

We have not often seen a place go in more unruffled tranquillity than the comedy produced here on Thursday evening, entitled "The Old School." Although stated in the bills to be original, yet it has every appearance of being a translation. The scene passes in London, and the characters are principally French refugees, the chief of these being Louis (Mr. W. Farren), who appears as a retainer of the Duke de Choiseul (Mr. Holl), but is in reality his uncle; and having promised the father of the Duke, on his deathbed, to stand by and protect his son, undertakes various situations to this end; and finally discovering the Duke has become attached to Estelle de Bagirel (Mr. Edwin Yarnold), in whom Louis discovers his own daughter, puts the nobleman to write a letter, treating for a more wealthy and advantageous alliance Of course an explanation and satisfactory denouement takes place, but the action of the piece is too slow to create any interest. This was, however, relieved by two excellent scenes, and in which Lorus endeavours to teach the Countess of Bloomsbury (Mrs. W. Clifford) the newly imported waltz a dance then just becoming known; and the other a fencing scene between Louis and Captain Scarab (Mr. Brindal) Here Mr. Farren's various situations in this and finally discovering the Duke has become attached to Estelle de Bagirel (Mr. Edwin Yarnold), in whom Louis discovers his own daughter, puts the nobleman to write a letter, treating for a more wealthy and advantageous alliance Of course an explanation and satisfactory denouement takes place, but the action of the piece is too slow to create any interest. The clear, cool heads of Manchester
As well as you must know
That if your Corn goes to the wall,
Their Cottons soon must go;
And then the hope were idle
To stand in your old shoes.
No! men don't care to ruin
Who have so much to lose!

The days are gone when lords of land
Were lords of men besides,
With "sake and soc, and toll and team,"
O'er human hearts and hides.
A cotton-spinner's son it is
Whose counsels guide the state;
For feudal dreams, and feudal schemes,
You've come an age too late.

Then gird your loins, by wit and will,
With foreign crops to vie;
We will engage to find demand,
If you will find supply.
Increase your labourers—drain your lands,
By tiles, and not by rent;
We'll answer for't, you'll find the soil
Pay more than three per cent.

LITERATURE.

THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND, DURING THE THIRTY YEARS' PEACE, 1815–1845. By CHARLES KNIGHT. Part I. Knight and Co.

This is the commencement of an undertaking of extreme difficulty; but of which rare and importance in proportion to the success with which that difficulty is surmounted. By every reader of middle age, who is gifted with a well-regulated mind, the merits of the work here commenced, will, more or less, be subjected to the severest test, that of impartial judgment, based upon observation concurrent with that of the historian himself; figuratively speaking, here are no dry bones to reanimate; the period scarcely belongs to the Past, but lies midway between that and the Present—in medio reptus. To write history impartially, is, at best, a high branch of art; to write contemporary history, such as the work before us should consist of, is the experimentum crucis of authorship.

From an exceed ngly well written Prospectus, we gather that the author regards the word History in its original meaning "inquiry" or "search" after facts, and the notion of recording them: "In undertaking the difficult task of speaking of recent actions, and occasionally of living agents, he knows that his own safety lies in calm and dispassionate inquiry. He makes no claim for support, beyond what he hopes may be conceded to industry and a Love of Truth. He will spare no pains to arrive at right conclusions by a diligent examination of facts; he will endeavour to resist every temptation to present facts in any other light than that of Justice." At all events, his work, according to the announcement, will not have the besetting sin of history—to show that "the whole human species consisted but of about 150 people, called and dignified by the titles of Emperors, kings, Popes, Generals, and Ministers." On the other hand, this will be a History of the People, "who," says the author, "in the largest sense of the word, have become, during this period of general improvement, of far higher consideration, as an essential element of political calculations, than at any previous period." This is one of the most recommendatory characteristics of the "Pictorial History of England," of which, work, by the way, Mr. Knight's "History" is the continuation, or rather, completion.

The portion before us extends from the Peace of Paris, in 1815, to the Spafields Riot, in 1816, and the "traitorous conspiracy" of Watson, Thistlewood, &c. The narrative is attractively written; although, in certain portions, there is a confusion of time, which, to us, appears objectionable. Thus, "On the workday ere John Scott, Lord Eldon;" and, a few lines on, "he was the last great man who belonged to this seat."

A singular feature in the authorities quoted in the margin will show that great diligence and judgment have been exercised in their selection and estimate. Nevertheless, we do not understand the principle in every instance. Thus, in one page, Matthew Wood is designated a partisan Lord Mayor (though he personally aided in pulling down the rioters of 1816); and in the adjoining page, Henry Brougham's Speeches are cited as historian evidence.

In this glance at the opening of the new History, we need scarcely add our best wishes for its successful progress to completion. A work of such excellent promise merits confidence and encouragement; and such, we doubt not, it will at once receive.

EVENINGS AT HADDON HALL. Edited by the BARONESS DE CALABRELLA. Colburn.

As this superb work belongs essentially to the "Illustrated" class, we shall first direct attention to its embellishments. These are twenty-four exquisite engravings, from designs by George Cattermole; and a more picturesque or graceful artistical collection, it has scarcely been our good fortune to witness. They illustrate a series of tales of love and chivalry; the locality of their re-action being Haddon Hall, "in the most singular and romantic, and, withal, the most beautiful of the edifices of our old-fashioned England, the district of the Peak."

"It is," says the introductory chapter, "to Haddon Hall, with its noble recollections, its happy associations, and the still happier promises and prophecies of what may be, that we desire the reader to accompany us in imagination, while we endeavour to place before him, in a light worthy of their unequalled beauty, results of the pictorial art, which nothing but scenes and social attachments like those of Haddon in the Olden time could have inspired, and which, in the presence of more modern localities and associations, would lose half their interest, and all that dignified propriety and appropriateness which are the crowning graces of high art."

The framework of the narrative is that a party lately assembled at Haddon to celebrate the birth-day of the young heiress, having been reduced to a comparatively small circle of relations and intimates, the grand entertainments were abandoned, and the well-stored library became the resort of the remaining guests. Emma, had nearly taken possession of the party, when, at last, the lovely daughter of the house, the Lady Ada, on turning over a portfolio of drawings by George Cattermole, suddenly exclaimed, "Will some one come and explain what these beautiful pictures mean?" A long pause ensued, and the case seemed almost hopeless, when a lady, (there is nothing like female wit for solving a knotty point, for, if no other course is left, she will cut the knot, and solve it that way,)—a lady exclaimed, "it would be easier, I suspect, to frame an illustration of each of these beautiful designs, than explain, even from the artist himself, an intelligible account of the incidents of which they are illustrations." The proposition was disturbed by the loss of a bet, but, in the evening, the party re-assembled in the library, when Lady Eva commenced carrying out her plan by handing five of the drawings to a young and enthusiastic admirer of the chivalric age and its attributes—and requesting him to improvise a tale that should make the pictures as intelligible as if they were executed for it, not it for them." The appeal was not to be resisted, and the gallant proceeded to relate "The Tournament."

The first illustrates the young Knight's choice of the guise of full-armed war; the armourer riveting on the suit; the Knight's departure for the tournament; the lists; and the Knight's death; all designed and engraved in the first style of the art.

The second story is related by "the lady of a distinguished diplomatist" the Lero, Andrani, an Italian captive in the dungeon in the Castle of L Garda. With this narrative closes the First Evening.

The Second Evening is occupied by the "Fortunes of the Glengary," and "Love's Last Tryst, a Romance of Venice." Thus, the plan proceeds through Six Evenings, and some 450 goodly octavo pages of letter-press, of varied merit and attraction—the narrators now discoursing of Hernando Cortez—then of a gay scene at Delmar Castle—next singing of Queen Mary and "Leven's dark tower." Then comes a tale of astrology; next, the wanderings connected with Naples—then, to the Deserts of Nubia—anon to the Greek War—then to the south of France and Strasburg, &c., until the portfolio was exhausted, and the Birthday Revels were over!

The illustrative scenes are of the figure and landscape classes: the Tournament scenes is, perhaps, the most successful; but there are some picturesque compositions of fountain, abbey, and garden terrace, &c. In the list of engravers are the names of Stocks, Goodyear, Rolls (C. and H.), Bentley, Brandard, Redclife, Colleen, Engleheart, &c.; and, taken as a whole, their performances in this volume have rarely been equalled for delicacy and neatness.

With such attractions, we are not surprised to learn that the "Evenings at Haddon Hall" has already found its way to the library and drawing-room tables of the first and wealthy patrons of art and literary luxury; a distinction which the undertaking amply deserves. The volume is bound, in fitting taste: the gilding is especially elegant and appropriate

MURRAY'S HOME AND COLONIAL LIBRARY.

The publisher of this popular series has taken altogether, the most sterling work on its class—has lately enriched its cards with two reprints of copyrights, viz., Lord Mahon's "Life of Prince Eugene" (Nos. XXVI. and XXVII.), and Washburne's "Gypsies in Spain," (Nos. XXVII. and XXIX.) In the first work, the accomplished historian records the career of Condé, styled "the Great" on account of his military abilities and vast success; leading the warrior Prince from his boyhood, through a long trail of conquest, to the close of his life, amidst the peaceful society of men of letters. What a galaxy of glory, what a broad-sheet of fame, is this eloquent biography of Condé. Mr. Borrow's work on Gypsy Life is altogether another order of composition, thus proving the judgment of the Editor of the "Home and Colonial Library" as regards variety of selection. Lord Mahon's historical biography is a labour of history; Mr. Borrow wrote his volumes by snatches in the vestas and posadas of Spain, under circumstances more favourable for close observation than literary composition; and, contrasting their interest with that of the records of silken Peers, we may say—

"Hath not custom made true life more sweet
Than that of painted pomp? Are not these woods
More free from peril than the envious court?"

Considering the chequered attractions of Mr. Murray's Library, we must add that it merits a place in every home of the empire: it is, from first to last, a liberal boon to book-buyers.

PORTRAITS AND MEMOIRS OF THE MOST ILLUSTRIOUS PERSONAGES OF GREAT BRITAIN. By EDMUND LODGE, Esq., F.S.A. W. Smith

This is a Cabinet Edition of Mr. Lodge's splendid Library work published some years since in ten imperial octavo volumes. It is proposed to give in each Part, published at 1s., five Portraits, with Memoirs: in the three Numbers before us, the Portraits are well engraved, mostly from pictures by Holbein. The historical and biographical accompaniments have all the merits and perspicuity to be expected from Norroy King at Arms, their distinguished author: they record the lives of the most illustrious personages of the reign of the Eighth Henry, who, as it is endeavoured to show in painting in England, is entitled to special commemoration as the great professors of the art, and the importance of the period renders their early practice of paramount interest. The present work must, therefore, be regarded as a treasurable acquisition to that indispensable domestic feature of our times, "the family library."

KNIGHT'S PENNY MAGAZINE. PART I.

The Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, we opine, are nearly defunct: their "Cyclopædia" is complete; their "Biographical Dictionary" is at a standstill; and, at the close of last year, their "Penny Magazine" terminated its existence, after twelve years' sharp warfare against individual interests. It is not worth while to chronicle the Society's eccentric career and literary eccentricity; amidst all which their labours have wrought an advantageous change in the practice of book making. The Editor of the present work no longer sails under the Society's flag: he has his own "Penny Magazine," and a very agreeable and intelligent Miscellany it is, with less utilitarianism than the original: a fondness for olden literature, sensibly indulged; glances at new lights of science; occasional tales and legends; a graphic account of the opening of Parliament; and an excellent analytical review of Carlyle's "Oliver Cromwell;" the whole liberally illustrated by the classic pencil of Harvey and other artists.

COUNTRY NEWS.

LORD ASHLEY'S RETIREMENT FROM DORSETSHIRE.—Lord Ashley has retired from the representation of his native county. His Lordship, in his address to his constituents, admits that he has changed his opinion upon the subject of the Corn-laws, and now does not think protection necessary. He resigns his seat, however, in consequence of the pledge that he appeal to the country in 1841 was, in fact, an appeal on the question of the Corn-laws. The noble Lord, therefore, says: "As all personal pledges were asked or given, I should be acting in contravention of an honourable understanding if I were to consider myself and the electors on this question as free, and to remain my seat, and vote for the Ministerial measure." Lord Ashley intends to call for a show of hands on the day of nomination, in order to ascertain, without doubt, the opinion of the constituency.

ELECTION FOR MIDHURST.—The election for this borough took place on Friday (last week.) Mr. Spencer Horatio Walpole was returned without opposition. Mr. Walpole, in returning thanks, took a review of the proposition now before Parliament, and expressed great doubt whether any good would arise from them. With regard to the proposition which affected corn, he expressed it as strong terror.

ELECTION FOR EAST SUSSEX.—On Tuesday the election for East Sussex, in the room of Mr. Darby, took place at Lewes. C. H. Frywen, Esq., was returned without opposition. The hon. gentleman, in addressing the assembled electors on returning thanks, he said, he considered that this was a most momentous crisis. A measure was before Parliament, which he could not otherwise look upon than as one that was highly injurious and detrimental to the interests of the community, and he assured them that he should give that measure his most determined opposition. They did not know what course events would take, but if the measure should pass the House of Commons, it was possible, and he hoped it would be thrown out by the House of Lords. And if Sir Robert Peel resigned office, then he said that the only man who could succeed him was the excellent Lord Lieutenant of that county. (This allusion to the Duke of Richmond was received with laughter.) If, on the contrary, Parliament was dissolved, he sincerely hoped that the friends of protection to British industry would come forward and do their duty—would fight the battle as they did in 1841, and depend upon it victory was theirs.

ELECTION FOR THE COUNTY OF RUTLAND.—The Hon. Gerard J. Noel, second son of the Earl of Gainsborough, is to be the candidate for Rutlandshire, in the room of the Hon. Mr. Dawnay. It is not expected that there will be any opposition. Mr. Noel is at present at Rome; but he has been sent for, and those of his family who have sanctioned his being put forward, have promised that he will "advocate protection," and "oppose any further inroads upon the Protestant Constitution."

LICHFIELD ELECTION.—On Saturday last, the Hon. Edward Lloyd Mostyn was returned without opposition, in the room of Lord Leveson, who has been raised to the House of Lords by the death of Lord Granville. Mr. Mostyn, referring to Sir R. Peel's pamphlet, said that it was entitled to their consideration. In the room of the Hon. Mr. Dawnay. It is not expected that there will be any opposition. Mr. Noel is at present at Rome; but he has been sent for, and those of his family who have sanctioned his being put forward, have promised that he will "advocate protection," and "oppose any further inroads upon the Protestant Constitution.

GREAT CHESS MATCH BETWEEN MR. STAUNTON AND M. HORWITZ.—(SEE PRECEDING PAGE.)

PRESENTATION OF PLATE.

A very interesting scene was witnessed at Sheffield on the 27th ult., on the occasion of the Workmen of Cornish-place presenting to their former excellent Master, James Dixon, Esq., a handsome Memorial of his retiring from business in the year 1842.

The Testimonial is a full sized Epergne or Candelabrum, surmounted by a richly cut glass bowl for fruit, with an inverted basket as a trellis for flowers, on which is introduced, as a finial, the family crest. The basement is of an irregular triangle, with appropriate ornaments, and supported at angles by three lions passant guardant, in perfect relief and exquisite workmanship. One of the intervening compartments are uniform escutcheons, one of which is a brief inscription, in raised characters, to James Dixon, Esq., &c.; another, the armorial bearings of the family; and the remaining one, a medallion descriptive of faith in commerce. From the basement, a centre rises of a composite foliage entwining six richly-perforated arms of a varied design, but in perfect harmony, to support glass or lights; and, as a whole, forms a complete mass of bright and frosted silver, on a plateau of plate glass, above which the Epergne rises 30 inches. Value 200 guineas.

SILVER EPERGNE PRESENTED TO JAMES DIXON, ESQ., SHEFFIELD.

The design of this Epergne is in good taste, and the workmanship such as we believe has never been surpassed. It was made in the silver-plated department at Cornish-place, designed by Mr. Thomas Nicholson, jun., and modelled and executed by Mr. Vincent Robinson.

Tuesday, Jan. 27th, the seventieth anniversary of the birthday of Mr. Dixon, was appropriately chosen for the presentation at Page Hall, by a deputation of twenty-four workmen, representing various departments. On arriving at the Hall, they were very courteously received by W. F. Dixon, Esq., W. Fawcett, Esq., James Willis Dixon, Esq., and J. Henry Dixon, Esq., and were ushered into the drawing-room, where several of the ladies and junior branches of the family were seated, who were shortly joined by Captain Ramsay and Dr. Hallieck. In a few minutes, Mr. Dixon entered the room, and was received with every mark of attachment and respect. The Epergne stood upon a table in the centre of the room. Mr. Dixon having taken his seat, Mr. W. Rhodes introduced Mr. Hobson, who presented the Epergne. Mr. Miller then read the following Memorial:—

MEMORIAL TO JAMES DIXON, ESQ.

This splendid silver Epergne was presented to James Dixon, Esq., by the workmen late in his employment at Cornish-place, as a memento of his public worth and private virtues, and as a testimony of their high esteem for his integrity of character, spirit of laudable enterprise, and habits of unwearied industry in promoting the interests of trade and commerce, and patronizing with a liberal hand, institutions of religion and benevolence.

Signed on behalf of the workmen,

WM. RHODES

January 27th, 1846

Mr. Dixon returned thanks in a speech full of excellent feeling, and, at its close, handed to the deputation a purse of 50 sovereigns. After addresses from Mr. Hughes, Mr. F. W. Dixon (who presented the deputation with a cheque for £20), Mr. Fawcett, Mr. J. W. Dixon, Mr. H. Dixon, Mr Gill, and Mr Rhodes, Mr Dixon, sen., led his visitors into an adjoining room, where an elegant cold collation was set out. Having spent some time in the enjoyment of the liberal entertainment provided, the deputation returned to Sheffield by three o'clock, to report to their fellow-workmen. The evening was spent in mutual felicitations, in dinners and tea-parties; and the proceedings of the day will long be remembered with high satisfaction in Sheffield.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS, RECENTLY DECEASED.

SIR FREDERICK WILLIAM MULCASTER, K.C.H.

Lieut.-Gen. Sir Frederick William Mulcaster, K.C.H., late Inspector General of Fortifications, died at Charlton-place, near Canterbury, on the 28th ult., aged 74. This gallant officer, Baron de Gera by inheritance from his mother, and successor to a proportion of the Seignory of Holzheim, in Bavaria, was son of Major Gen. Frederick George Mulcaster, Colonel of the Royal Engineers, by Wilhelmina, his first wife, daughter and co-heir of John William Gerard de Brahm, knight Legitime of the Roman Empire, and grandson of William Mulcaster, Esq., an officer of the Household of Frederick, Prince of Wales. He was appointed First Lieutenant of Royal Engineers in 1792; served in Portugal in 1794; participated in the capture of Minorca in 1799; was employed in the Mediterranean in 1800; and commanded the Engineers in the Mauritius, Isle of Bourbon, &c., from 1812 to 1817. He subsequently filled several staff appointments, became Colonel Commandant of the Royal Engineers in 1832, and was appointed Inspector General of Fortifications in 1834. The rank of Lieut.-General he attained in 1838. Sir Frederick married first, Mary Lucy, youngest daughter of John Montresor, Esq., of Belmont, Kent, and secondly, Esther, only daughter of William Harris, Esq., by the latter of whom he has left one son, Frederick Montresor, born in 1823.

SIR WILLIAM WAKE, BART.

This respected gentleman, the inheritor of extensive estates in Norfolk and Northamptonshire, was the representative of the great House of Wake, directly descended from Sir Thomas Wake, a gallant knight, who fought with the Black Prince, and distinguished himself particularly at the battle of Najarn. Of this ancient family, Archbishop Wake, and Baldwin, Lord Wake, were eminent members. Sir William was born in 1768, the elder son of the late Sir William Wake, Bart., by Mary, his wife, only daughter and heir of Richard Fenton, Esq., of Bank Top, county of York; and had, consequently, at the period of his decease, which occurred on the 27th ult., completed his 77th year. He married first, in 1790, Mary, only daughter of Francis Sitwell, Esq., of Reinshaw, county of Derby, and, by her, who died in 1791, had one son, Charles, the present baronet. He married second, in 1793, Jenny, daughter of the late Vice-Admiral James Gambier, by whom he has left several children.

SIR JAMES RIVETT CARNAC, BART.

At an early age, this gentleman was connected with the East, and became, eventually, Governor of Bombay; he was created a Baronet 12th of March, 1836, having filled the important office of Chairman of the East India Company, and having sat in Parliament for Sandwich. He was the eldest son of James Rivett, Esq., East India Company's Civil Service, who assumed, by Sign Manual, in 1801, the surname and arms of Carnac, in compliance with the will of his brother-in-law, General John Carnac, of the Company's service. The family of Rivett, from which the deceased Baronet derived, was settled for a considerable time in the county of Derby, but came, originally, from Suffolk. Sir James, born 11th November, 1784, married, 3d June, 1815, Anna Maria, eldest daughter of the late William Richardes, Esq., of Penglais, in Cardiganshire, and has left a numerous issue. His eldest son, the present Baronet, is Sir John Rivett Carnac.

GOLD SWORDS PRESENTED BY THE EAST INDIA COMPANY.

The Messrs. Garrard, of the Haymarket, have just manufactured, for the Hon. East India Company, two magnificent Gold Swords, to be presented to individuals who have distinguished themselves by their adherence to the British dominion in the East.

SWORDS PRESENTED BY THE HON. EAST INDIA COMPANY

One of these swords has a superb gold hilt, enamelled purple; the scabbard is of rich crimson velvet, and bears the following inscription:—

Presented by the East India Company to General Avitable, in grateful recognition of the eminent services rendered by him whilst Governor of Peshawur, in co-operation with the British troops, during the military operations in Afghanistan.

The second sword is similar to the above, but not enamelled. The scabbard bears this inscription:—

Presented by the East India Company to Chintamun Ras Appa Sahib Sangleekar, in testimony of their respect for his high character, and in acknowledgment of his unswerving fidelity and attachment to the British Government.

These splendid recognitions of courageous services in aid of the British rule, are as honourable to the East India Company to bestow as they must be gratifying to their receivers to accept. They are costly specimens of first-class manufacture, and are highly creditable to the artists to whom the commission has been entrusted.

Death of the Duke of Modena. In great part of our impression last week we mentioned the death of the Duke of Modena, which took place on the 21st ult., after a short illness, which it was not anticipated would have terminated fatally. The late Duke, Francis IV., Archduke of Austria, Prince Royal of Hungary and Bohemia; Duke of Modena, of Reggio, Mirandola, Massa, and Carrara, was eldest son of his Imperial Highness the Archduke Ferdinand, Duke of Modena and Brescia, and the Archd uchess Beatrice, Duchess of Massa and Princess of Carrara. He was born on the 6th of October, 1779, and married, 20th of June, 1812, Beatrice, Archduchess of Austria, daughter of Victor Emmanuel, King of Sardinia, and sister of the Empress of Austria. The Duchess died in September, 1840, leaving issue the Duchess Marie Thérèse, born on the 11th of July, 1817; the Duke Francis Ferdinand (Prince Hereditary); the Duke Ferdinand Charles Victor, born the 20th of July, 1821; and the Duchess Marie Beatrice Anne, born the 13th of February, 1824. The late Duke is succeeded by his son the Duke Francis Ferdinand Genuinien, Prince Hereditary, now Francis V. He was born 1st June, 1819, and married 30th March, 1842, Princess Adelgonde Augusta Charlotte, second daughter of the King of Bavaria.

The North of France Railway.—A Correspondent of the Journal des Chemins de Fer supplies some interesting information relative to the actual state of this railway. The earth-works and engineering are completed throughout the line. The rails are laid between Paris and Clermont, and between Arras and the frontier by way of Douai and Lille, and Douai and Valenciennes. The most backward part of the works is between Amiens and Arras; but, notwithstanding the unfavourable season and the difficult nature of the soil, it is expected to be finished in March. The houses and posts for watchmen, and the barriers at all crossings on a level are completed. The stations are in a state of forwardness. The carrying-stock is not ready, or the whole line, with the exception of the part between Amiens and Arras, might be opened in a short time. The company, to which the working of the line has been conceded, intends to open the portions from Paris to Pontoise, and from Douai to the frontier by Paris and Lille in the course of March; temporary stations, &c., will be erected to that end. The towns of Lille, Valenciennes, Douai, Arras, &c., contemplate an application to Government to accelerate the movements of the Company, and the bureau of bridges and highways is understood to be disposed to receive such an application favourably. Hopes are entertained of the whole line being open by July.

FALL OF A WAREHOUSE, IN LIVERPOOL.

About half-past eleven o'clock, on Saturday morning last, a frightful accident occurred in Moor-street, Liverpool. The north side of that street is entirely occupied by warehouses, chiefly for the storage of grain and flour. They are generally about six stories high. Midway on the right from Fenwick-street, is a warehouse known as "Tipping's," one of the oldest in Moor-street. This warehouse, which was seven stories high, and was in the occupation of Mr. William Dean, was stored in most of the rooms with cotton, flour, and grain. The premises extended from Moor-street into the Old Ropery; and, about the time we have named, the Moor-street frontage fell with a terrific crash, the report of which instantly brought a large concourse of persons to the scene. At this moment, there were 16 porters employed in No. 2, amongst the grain and flour; fortunately, their operations were confined to the north end of the building, in the direction of the Old Ropery, where the warehouse has another frontage. They rushed to the jigger-rope, down which they slid, and escaped for the most part with a few bruises.

We ought to state that, while the Moor-street frontage gave way, the Old Ropery frontage remained intact; otherwise, the poor fellows who were employed in that part of the building must inevitably have perished. There were, at the time of the calamity, 11,000 sacks of flour, large quantities of the same material in barrels, and much cotton and grain in the building. The cause of the accident is believed to have been the loading of the warehouse beyond its capacity.

A Liverpool artist happened to be on the spot just after the fall of the building, and made the annexed sketch of the ruin: the scene presented a singular appearance; barrels of flour, corn, joists, bricks, and iron-work, lay mingled in one vast heap, filling up the roadway of the narrow street.

PROFESSOR RISLEY AND HIS SONS, AT DRURY LANE THEATRE.

DRURY-LANE THEATRE.

The very clever performances of Mr. Risley and his two sons continue to be nightly received with the loudest acclamations. Certainly nothing like it in the way of posturing was ever seen before. There is a graceful ease and precision in the manner in which all their evolutions are accomplished, exceedingly attractive; and the apparent absence of all painful contortions or tottering overtasking of the ligaments, renders their gymnastics entirely free from unpleasant and unnatural postures. The most nervous spectator is never under any apprehension for the safety of the boys, who are flung about in the air as though they could support themselves on it, were it necessary; and never fail to alight safely on their legs, with kitten-like certainty. The eldest boy has grown, since he was last performing in England at the Haymarket and Surrey Theatres, but has lost none of that winning manner and prepossessing appearance which everyone must have remarked. Since the period just alluded to, the Risleys have been half over Europe, and their performances have everywhere been greeted with the warmest approbation. We can confidently recommend everbody to witness these clever evolutions, if they have not already done so. We subjoin a cut from a sketch of them in one of their most effective tours de force.

The charming Flora Fabbri took her departure on Saturday, together with her husband, M. Bretin: and this has, of course, put an end to the representations of the "Diable á Quatre." This clever danseuse may reckon upon a warm reception whenever she returns to England. Meantime a new ballet is in preparation, to be called "The Island Nymph." The principal parts will be played by Mdlle. Maria and M. Desplace, from the Académie Royale; and Mdlle. Neodat, from the Grand Opera, at Madrid.

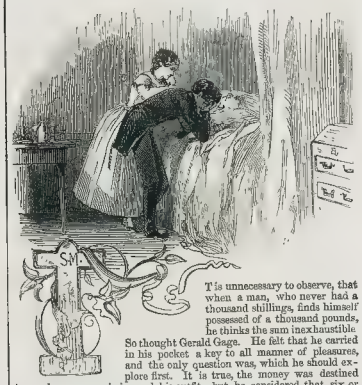
GERALD GAGE; OR, THE SECRET.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SUSAN HOPLEY," ETC.

CHAPTER VI.



It is unnecessary to observe, that when a man, who never had a thousand shillings, finds himself possessed of a thousand pounds, he thinks the sum inexhaustible. So thought Gerald Gage. He felt that he carried in his pocket a key to all manner of pleasures, and the only question was, which he should explore first. It is true, the money was destined to purchase a commission and his outfit; but he considered that six or seven hundred pounds was enough for that, and the rest he was at liberty to do as he liked with. But then there was Emily. The six months she had insisted on were already elapsed, and he was bound in honour to go and claim her hand; but what was a subaltern in a marching regiment to do with a wife! He loved her still—as selfish men love; and if he had been in any danger of losing her, he would probably have enforced his claim as energetically as he had done before. But he felt so sure of her, that his mind was sufficiently disengaged to see all the inconveniences that would arise from their union; more especially now, that he was resolved not to go into the church. The humblest curate must have a home; and, however his poverty may be augmented by having a wife to support, his respectability is not diminished. The world feels that, in the manner of life he is destined to, he needs a companion; and an early marriage, if it cannot be approved, is rather pitied than blamed. But a subaltern with nothing but his pay, places himself, and the woman he marries, in a situation that vibrates between the melancholy and the ridiculous. The red coat and the gold epaulettes, and the miserable barrack-room that serves for parlour and bed-room, form an incongruous whole, that no man with the slightest reflection would choose to introduce his wife to. Gerald had not much reflection, but he had a great deal of pride, which served equally well to enlighten him on this occasion. The obscure curate and the smart ensign were two different persons; and the one might have been proud of the wife that the other would be ashamed of. Not but that any man might have been proud of Emily's beauty and accomplishments; but, what are beauty and accomplishments to a woman who is obliged to wash her own stockings? Gerald could not bear the thought of it. He was involuntarily beginning to measure himself and form his ideas, according to what he expected to be hereafter, not according to what he was now; and his college friends, as soon as they learned the good fortune that awaited him, helped him to cherish the delusion. He found himself hourly rising in importance. They declared he was the luckiest dog in the world, with his million of money in perspective; and affirmed that no man need want cash, or anything that cash can purchase, with such a prospect before him. All this was very seducing to an impetuous, impatient, aspiring lad of one-and-twenty, who had, all his life, felt the gêne and mortification of being poorer than his companions, and had thirsted for pleasures that he could not afford. But tying himself to a wife was tying himself to poverty and obscurity. Prudence, as well as selfishness—and Gerald, like most men, was selfish—forbad it; the misfortune was, that he had not thought of all this before he prevented Emily's marriage with Mr. Weston. But the jealousy that had been aroused by hearing of her engagement had rendered him reckless of all consequences; and the wound to his self-love had been so acute, that even Mr. Pilrig's grand secret fell coldly on his ears; nor could his pre-occupied mind and eager passions stop to weigh its importance, until he had accomplished the object that absorbed him, and to which all the energies of his nature were at the moment directed. But, the marriage with Mr. Weston broken off, the jealousy appeased, the self-love and the vanity satisfied, a calm ensued, which afforded leisure for other reflections; and then it was that the brilliant prospect opened to him began to play its part on his unstable mind. The dull curacy and the sober habits which he had always looked upon with distaste, now inspired him with disgust; and, although he still loved Emily as much as he could love any woman, where there was neither the excitement of pursuit nor the zest of uncertainty, he felt he did not love her well enough to bind himself, for an indefinite term, to a life of poverty and obscurity for her sake. But how, without insulting her, was he to evade the arrangement that had been made for their union, now that the appointed period had arrived? It is true that the objections he had to urge were in the highest degree reasonable; but he felt, after all that had passed, that they ought to proceed from her, not from himself. In him, caution was coldness, and he feared that she would not fail to discern its true character; in her, it was the offspring of reflection—the fruit of a young mind, tutored and strengthened by adversity. But, whilst he was debating whether to make some excuse for absenting himself from the vicarage till he could determine what to do, or whether to go down immediately and claim the hand of his affianced bride, leaving it to her judgment to consent or decline as she thought proper,

Fate took the affair into her own hands. His father, returning one dark night from visiting the death bed of one of his parishioners, rode into an old marl-pit, where he was found lying beside his horse on the following morning. He was carried home in a state of insensibility, and a letter was despatched to his son, who arrived just time enough to receive his last breath and the hand of Emily, which the dying parent placed in his, with an earnest injunction to take her to his heart, and make her as happy as she deserved to be.

The death of his father affected Gerald's feelings, softened his heart, and steadied his character for a time; and Emily's attractions regained their influence over his fluctuating mind. His dreams of ambition and vision of splendour grew dim and faded before the delights of a pure and innocent love. The image of the despised curacy, and the pleasures of a life of retirement and virtue, took the place of his aspiring hopes and restless desires, and he eagerly intreated her to comply with his father's last wishes, and become his wife.

But, young as she was, Emily's sad experience had taught her caution. She knew how unstinted Gerald was to encounter poverty, and well understood how much worse poverty was with a family than without it; so she intreated him to wait till he was in some situation that should at least secure them want. Whereupon, as gentlemen are apt to do in such cases, he accused her of want of affection; declaring that true love made no such calculations; and that poverty together would be much more endurable than poverty apart. But she was firm in what she knew to be right, and would not be shaken. So, he wrote to a former pupil of his father, to solicit the patronage that had been promised to the old man; resolving to return to Oxford next term, read hard, make up for lost time, and take orders. And, in the meanwhile, they both took up their abode with an aunt of his, a single woman, with a very small income, which she eked out by letting part of the house she resided in.

All the money the young people had between them was Gerald's one thousand pounds, which, indeed, appeared to him inexhaustible. But, as Emily thought differently, although she did not refuse, in some measure, to share it with him, she insisted on helping herself with her needle, as she had done before.

For a few weeks Gerald read, and the novelty of living under the roof with Emily supported him through the tameness of existence; but as time crept on, ennui crept in, and it was impossible not to observe that he was becoming depressed and restless. Nothing could be more natural. Although Gerald could have studied for an immediate object, he did not love study for its own sake. He wanted a powerful incentive to keep him to it, and the remote prospect of the curacy was not strong enough for the purpose. Then, though he loved Emily, the love grew cool with security; there were no doubts, fears, nor jealousies, to stir the flame and keep it bright. He began to yawn a great deal, stretch out his legs as if he did not know what to do with them, turn over the leaves of his books without reading them, and look out of the window into the dull back street where there was nothing to see. Emily worked on the while, thinking how fortunate it was she had kept her resolution, and bade him walk out more, and seek some recreation; so, in compliance with this recommendation, he one night went to the theatre, and there the first persons he saw were his friends Willoughby and Vane; the former of whom introduced him to his sister, Madame de Violane, a very lovely woman, married to a Frenchman.

A few words whispered by Willoughby to his sister and her husband, immediately after the introduction, caused the lady to turn upon him, with a look of awakened interest, a pair of the finest dark eyes he had ever seen; whilst the foreigner, who had already acknowledged the introduction by the requisite number of bows, involuntarily added a supernumary one, in compliment to the kiss he had received; and Gerald felt that he was enjoying a foretaste of his future—a first instalment of the homage which the reputation of great wealth is sure to command.

"Where are you staying?" said Vane: "we're at the York."

"I'm visiting a sick friend a little way out of town," replied Gerald, "or else I'd ask you to call on me. How long are you going to stay?"

"A few days only," said Willoughby. "We've been making a tour, to show the Marquis a little of the country. Our next move is to London, and then to Paris. But you must come and see us; come to breakfast to-morrow at eleven."

Gerald promised that he would, and Madame de Violane's beautiful eyes expressed her satisfaction at the arrangement.

It is singular, and not much to the credit of human nature, that we are more gratified by the homage paid to our wealth than to our merits. Gerald was extremely handsome young man; but, as he had not a confirmed air of fashion, Madame de Violane's first glance had been one of utter indifference. He saw it; he saw the change that ensued, and comprehended it, and yet he was won by a compliment so little flattering; and felt more proud and pleased when she selected his arm to lean on when leaving the theatre, than if the preference had been given to his personal qualities, instead of to a fortune which he not only did not possess, but which he never might possess; and which, even supposing it his, he had attained without effort, and without desert. But mankind and womankind are so fond of being admired for what they are not, that very few are content to take credit for what they are.

Madame de Violane shook hands as cordially with Gerald, when he handed her into her carriage, as if she had known him a dozen years; whilst the Frenchman, as he stepped in after her, made several deferential bows, which tacitly announced his undisguised respect for wealth; after which, Gerald walked home to his obscure lodging in a state of confusion and excitement that would have made it difficult to analyze his own feelings, if he had tried. His cheeks were flushed, and his eye was animated by pleasure, and his heart was big with the triumph of gratified pride; and yet there was a weight, a constriction, about the breast; an undefined feeling of dissatisfaction and insecurity, and apprehension for the future; so that, when he accosted Emily, who was sitting up for him, she was puzzled to interpret the mixed expression of his countenance, and his manner was cold and excited, his complexion was heightened, and his eyes were bright and triumphant; but there was an alloy about the mouth—the smiles were not free, and frank, and joyous; some unseen, unknown, almost unfelt, care sat there; a portent, a shadow, that came unsummoned, and would not be exorcised, and that made a strange discordance with the lustrous brow, that Emily's first words were, "Where have you been, Gerald? What has happened?"

"Nothing," answered he, gaily, "except that I have met some friends —some old college chums."

"Is that all?" said she.

"All, except that I am going to breakfast with them to-morrow at eleven," said he.

"Are they staying in Bath?" asked Emily.

"Only for a few days," replied Gerald. "There's Willoughby, and Vane, and a sister of Willoughby's, that's married to a Frenchman. I never can understand how English women can marry Frenchmen."

"Nor I," replied Emily: "is she pretty?"

"Yes, she is," answered Gerald: "she has beautiful dark eyes."

"And what sort of man is he?"

"Oh! he's not ill-looking, he's well enough for a Frenchman," replied Gerald. "He's a Marquis, too."

"And are they rich?" asked Emily.

"That I don't know," answered Gerald. "She was beautifully dressed; but I don't think one could have had any fortune; for I've heard Willoughby say that every thing went to the eldest son, who will be a Baronet, and that the rest of them had nothing but their name to get on with."

"And where did you see them?" inquired Emily.

"At the theatre, where I asked in for an hour," answered Gerald. They happened to be in the very box I was put into."

"Oh, how I should have liked to be with you!" exclaimed Emily.

"What for?" asked Gerald.

"Why, to have seen the play to be sure;" answered she. "It's so long since I saw a play! What's it as?"

"The play? I'm sure I don't know," replied he. "We were talking all the time; I never attended to it."

"Well, then, I'm glad I wasn't of the party," answered Emily. "I should have been out of patience. But don't you think we might go some night to the pit? It wouldn't cost much, and it would be such a treat to me! I've never seen a play since my dear father died."

"Oh, yes, we can go, certainly," answered Gerald, rather coldly; "but we had better wait till these people are away. It would be awkward if they saw us."

"Then we'll look out for a nice play," said Emily, "and have a delightful evening, as soon as your fine friends are gone. We shall not have much gaiety for the rest of our lives, I dare say; so we may venture to indulge for once."

"Why," asked Gerald, "why are we not to have much gaiety for the rest of our lives?"

"Why, setting aside that we shall not be able to afford it," answered Emily, "you know we shall probably be relégués to the end of the world, when you get your curacy—far out of the atmosphere of theatres, and all such temptations."

The lustre of Gerald's brow, which had been gradually fading, vanished. "The curacy!" said he; "I'm sure, I'm not made for it, nor it for me. There's no use in trying to force one's inclinations into a channel nature never designed them for. I'm sure the thing will never do; and it's better not to enter on it, than to thrust oneself into a situation, only to show one's unfitness for it."

"But, what other resource have we?" asked Emily, surprised at a declaration, apparently, so sudden; "and what has altered your intention?"

"Reflection, and the knowledge of my own character," replied Gerald. "I never did like the profession, and I like it less and less, the more I think of it. As for what we're to do, I'm sure I can't tell. I've a mind to go to London, and try if I can't get some sort of situation!"

"But we've no interest, Gerald," objected Emily. "We've no friends to help us to a situation."

"I don't know that," answered Gerald. "Willoughby's father's in Parliament, and Vane's uncle is Secretary-at-War. They're both devilish civil to me, because they expect some day I shall be richer than any of them; and I don't think they'd be sorry to have an opportunity of laying me under an obligation. Vane told me, some time ago, that, if I liked to go into the army, he'd speak to his uncle about me."

"But the army 'll never do for us, Gerald, without money," said Emily.

"What a thing poverty is!" exclaimed Gerald with sudden bitterness. "What a thing it is to be a gentleman, and not be able to live like other people. Here we are, pent up in this little dirty hole of a lodging, that I shall be obliged to sneak into and sneak out of for fear any of these people should see me. I told them I was living out of town, to prevent their offering to call on me."

NATIONAL SPORTS.

HANDICAP RACING

"Men's judgments are
A parcel of their fortunes." SHAKESPEARE.

In almost every other country of the world, all changes and modifications of existing systems are brought about by some contrivance (ordinance ideas—firman—and the like), which enables the Government to act as the moving principle of the body politic. Here, opinion is the mainspring of the social and political machine. We do not jump at our conclusions, but arrive at them as our views were wont to reach the end of their journies—by means of a good steady pace. This adoption of the slow plan, attended, in nearly every instance, by a sure consequence, whether for good or evil for general convenience or the reverse, perhaps remains to be seen, so far as the matter in hand has relation to the present date. Latterly, so recently, indeed, that our allusions to it is to be found in any work on the turf the Handicap has become the most popular form of British racing.

It would be a libel to suppose the reader ignorant of that remarkable scheme—an institution of such pure and perfect benevolence as might have been expected rather to have originated among the followers of Plato than with the disciples of Mammon. Human virtue, perhaps, never ventured upon a bolder flight than when it sought to bring into operation in the nineteenth century the theories of the golden age, and offered for the patronage of these iron times a scale of honesty, whose rewards achieving the impossible, the principle of perfectibility heretofore only "dreamt of in your philosophy."

Thus far we find this great fact a marvel of modern virtue intrinsically its machinery, there is nothing to be marvelled at in the success that has attended its operation. The principle was brought about by sapping the foundations, and not by storming the strong hope of prepossession. The British turf enjoys the proud monopoly of exhibiting to the world, in the matter of details, a

HOME AND FRIENDS.

WRITTEN BY CHARLES SWAIN, ESQ.; COMPOSED BY J. BLEWITT.

Moderato, with expression.

Oh, there's a power to make each hour As sweet as Heaven de-signed it; Nor need we roam to bring it home, Though few there be that find it. Though few there be that find it. We seek too high for things close by, And lose what Na-ture found us; For life hath here no charms so dear As home and friends a-round us, As home and friends a-round us, As home and friends a-round us, As home and friends a-round us, Home and friends, Home and friends, As home and friends a-round us. [Repeat in chorus.]

a tempo

Verse 2

We oft destroy the present joy
For future hopes—and praise them;
Whilst flowers as sweet bloom at our feet
If we'd but stoop to raise them;

For things afar still sweetest are
When Youth's bright spell hath bound us,
But soon we're taught the earth hath naught
Like home and friends around us

The friends that speed in time of need,
When Hope's last reed is shaken,
Will shew us still, that come what will
We are not quite forsaken.

Verse 3.

Though all were night, if but the light
From Friendship's star crowned us,
Would prove the bliss of earth was this—
Our home—and friends around us.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

No. 198.—Vol. VIII.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1846. [Sixpence.

IMPROVEMENTS.

A petition has just been presented to the Common Council of London, which draws attention to a subject imperatively demanding that some active measures should be taken with regard to it. At the present moment the public mind is engrossed by one topic alone—the debates on the Corn-laws. But man does not live by bread alone; and even in the full heat of the controversy that rages upon that one question, we may direct some notice to another and scarcely inferior one—the state of what are affectedly called the "low neighbourhoods" of this immense city, and the effect that condition has on the health of the people. What is called Society, the Public, or Government—which is but the embodiment of public power, municipal and imperial—is very difficult to rouse from apathy to action in such matters as these. Busied with the toils of heaping up wealth, or the more enervating process of squandering it, the community goes on, careless and ignorant of the evils amid which the life of all is cast. Different classes exist beside each other, but they never blend or mingle; and the total ignorance each has of each, leads to as total indifference and neglect. Reminders to all of what has yet to be done, and of what might be done, become highly necessary; duties are so easily forgotten, and exertion is so willingly avoided!

As evils can be best described by those who are or have been most exposed to them, we are glad to see that an Association of the working classes has been formed for the purpose of taking some measures to promote the Improvement of Public Health. All inquiries on this subject have hitherto been conducted by commissions or committees. The information which has been so collected is most valuable, but it need not be all we must go by, nor the only kind; the bulk of it is furnished by men in comparatively a higher position of life than the inhabitants of the places they describe—medical men, clergymen, and others who have to visit them professionally, but are not exposed to the daily and hourly evils of a residence in them. What they state is the truth, but not the whole truth, which is worse than anything even their experienced eyes can detect. A series of reports drawn up by such an Association as that above-named would add a valuable chapter to the Blue Books we are made so familiar with. The petition they have presented to the Common Council quotes from the evidence already published in the Report made to the Government; it is that of visitors only, yet it is frightful in the highest degree.

We need not fear having too much knowledge of the state of these filthy localities—these nests of contagion and disease. The richer classes of society are more likely to be better acquainted with the state of men who live at the antipodes than that of those who lie almost at their threshold. Power acts more directly at the extreme circumference of its sphere than at its very centre; at this moment, the Government is the actual importer of Corn for the poor of Ireland; it is imperative, and must be done; but, could not the same power exert itself to give the means of health to the industrious classes of London, as they are now providing food for the peasants of Ireland? The world has lately rang with descriptions of the dirt, filth, and squalor amid which live the tenants of a remote Irish township; yet their state is scarcely an exception to a general condition; the whole country is poor, being drained continually of its capital, leaving none for employment at home.

There are localities in London that present all the wretchedness of an Irish village, with evils superadded to be met with in a great city alone. Yet this is the centre and emporium of half the commerce of the world—the place to which tends all the wealth of the empire—where all is activity and employment, even to an excess of toil that differs little from slavery. Splendour has its palaces, and riches their dwelling-place, built with all that gold can command of convenience, comfort, and embellishment. The contrasts here are consequently more glaring, and the neglect that suffers them to continue more inexcusable. And there is some reason to fear that what have been called improvements—the driving new and handsome streets through these sinks of poverty and dirt—have a tendency to increase the evil rather than remove it. The locality only is changed; the population must be housed somewhere, and settles down in another neighbourhood, which is soon reduced by the same causes to exhibit the same consequences as the spot from which they were driven, often in an aggravated form.

It is against this aggravation of the evil that the petition to the Common Council protests. It says, and justly too, that the destruction of the old habitations of the poor—which, bad as they were, were the only ones they had—should be accompanied by some effort to provide them with dwellings at "reasonable and remunerative rents," instead of those which are given up for the public good. The process is being continued; and, besides, the extension of the different lines of railway further into the City, will have the same effect. What is to become of the "outcasts," as they may literally be called? There is no impossibility about making some provision for the difficulty. It is only a question of capital, and its investment; and we firmly believe that money spent in building a suitable class of houses, near where they are most wanted, on the improved plans that are now so common, would return a better interest than many of the millions that are about to be invested in Railways. The Corporation of London have voted 20,000*l.* a-year to be expended in improvements in the City, and the petitioners ask that, in the expenditure of that sum, the representations they make shall not be lost sight of. The Government has done, and is still doing, something in the right direction; but its legislation rather refers to future buildings, and extensions of towns, than present localities. These might be much improved by enforcing cleanliness; society would gain by it in many ways. The worst of these poisonous sinks is not, perhaps, that men die there; but, that they cannot live, during their abbreviated existence, with anything like health and strength. The body is alike predisposed to disease, and rendered unable to recover from its shock; health, to the working man, is money; and sickness and early death infallibly swell the demands on the funds of the rich, for the compulsory support of the orphans, and the destitute, and the disabled, which a little effort made to secure a purer air, better drainage, and a supply of water, would have preserved in health and strength, able and willing to work and maintain themselves.

ALGERIA.—FRENCH TROOPS ATTACKING AN ARAB ENCAMPMENT.—(SEE NEXT PAGE.)

THE FRENCH IN ALGERIA.

Accounts received from Africa, during the past week, dated from Setiff, the 20th of January, state that the Emir had fallen upon that place like a thunderbolt. In his march from Boghar to Fourn Ouad el-Djenan, he had pitilessly made razzias upon all the tribes which had not previously sent pledges of submission to his authority. The Arabs of the subdivision of Setiff are said to dread the appearance of Abd-el-Kader in their territory as they would that of the plague. The postscript of the letter states that he had at least 9000 well-mounted and aguerris horsemen with him. The Algerie publishes intelligence from the province of Constantine, relative to the disaster which befel the column of General Levasse. The present accounts are of a date posterior to those published by the same journal of the 12th, wherein the loss in men was laid down at 94. On the 26th ult. the losses were ascertained to be:—Dead bodies brought to Setiff by the column, 19; bodies found upon the scene of the disaster, and interred there, 174; men lost, and of worse fate nothing is known, 38; dead since entering the hospital of Setiff, 39—total, 260. Among the men at present in the hospital, upwards of 500 are frostbitten, and it is supposed by the medical men that one-fifth will never recover.

A more recent letter states that "a great mortality reigns among the French troops in the three provinces of Algiers, Oran, and Constantine. The hospitals are crowded, and more than 500 soldiers sank under the effects of fever and dysentry, in the province of Algiers alone, during the month of December last."

The Journal des Debats states that the Duke d'Aumale is shortly to rejoin the army in Africa

Altogether, the accounts received (though not published) in Paris, from Algeria, are of a very unsatisfactory character: and it is reported that Marshal Bugeaud will be recalled.

Meanwhile, our Engraving shows a scene from the system of warfare pursued by the French, and possesses instant interest. It represents a company of French soldiers surprising an Arab encampment; from a painting by M. Frederic Goupil.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

The Chamber of Deputies has at last voted the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne by a majority of 232 against 141.

Last Saturday evening the grand deputation of the Chamber of Deputies, appointed to present to the King the Address of the Chamber, in answer to the Speech from the Throne, was received by his Majesty at the Palace of the Tuileries. During the ceremony, the Duke of Aumale and Montpensier stood on the right and left of the Throne, and a great number of deputies also attended. M. Sauzet, the President of the Chamber, having read the Address, the King replied:—

"Gentlemen, I receive this Address with real satisfaction. I am happy to find in it so brilliant a manifestation of the support which you lend to my Government, and of that loyal and constant concurrence which is, at the same time, the foundation of its strength, and the guarantee of all our liberties. Public opinion acknowledges more and more that it is by the regular advance, and the perfect accord of all the powers of State, that France has attained the degree of prosperity upon which it gives, this day, so much pleasure to congratulate each other. Yes, gentlemen, I am happy to be able to express my confidence in the future prospects of our country. That confidence is strengthened by the sentiments which you have just now expressed, and it is to me a presage that that accord, descending to future generations, will continue to develope in France that emulating increasing welfare which all classes of society among us now enjoy. Such has been, for a long time, the wish of my heart—the end of my efforts; and my sweetest recompense will be the hope that my devotion will have tended to secure the benefits of it to my country."

This speech was received with loud cheering.

The shareholders of the Northern Railroad Company held a general meeting on Thursday (last week) in Paris, Baron de Rothschild in the chair. It appears from the report of the directors that in the month of March next the line will be opened as far as Clermont, and to Amiens in the month of April or the commencement of May. In June the entire line will be opened to the public. After the Report was read, the meeting unanimously resolved that the Creil and St. Quentin Railroad Company should be united with the Northern Company. A shareholder requested to know whether the directors of the Northern Railroad Company proposed to purchase the line from Fampoux to Hazebrouck? Baron de Rothschild replied that such an intention had been entertained, but that the negotiations had been broken off. The following remarkable facts appear from the Report:—1st, the number of shares transferred amount to 571,741, being one third more than the total number of shares issued; 2nd, that the buyers are to the sellers in the proportion 17,469 buyers to 884 sellers. On the 31st of January last the 400,000 shares issued were possessed by 18,000 individuals, being in the proportion of 22 shares to each holder.

THE WEST INDIES.

The Trent steamer has arrived from the West Indies with the mails, and brings important news from Mexico. Another revolution had broken out. General Paredes entered the capital on the 29th December last. Six thousand men were at St. Louis de Potosi. It was a military movement: the civil departments were compelled to join it. The revolution was proclaimed at Vera Cruz, and at Tampico. At the former place an officer and a few men were killed. About three hundred men took refuge in the church, and were afterwards allowed to leave the town.

The Government of Mexico had prepared to resist in an energetic manner They appointed General Bustamente Commander-in-chief, armed 3000 Civicos, or National Guard, barricaded trenches in all the roads, declared the capital city in a state of siege, and called out the male population between the ages of sixteen and twenty.

The garrisons of the fort of San Juan de Ulloa, Vera Cruz, Jalapa, Guanaxuato, Guadalajara, and Zacatecas, had pronounced in favour of Paredes, but the civil authorities in all those places and in several other towns issued manifestoes in favour of the Government. Several arrests were made, and the Bishop was constituted a prisoner in his palace at Jacubaya

Mr. Shidell, the new Minister of the United States, had not been received by the Government, under the plea that Mexico agreed to accept a Minister ad hoc for the regulation of the affairs of Texas, and not an envoy for generes purposes. Mr. Shidell had written a very angry note, and retired to Jalapa, there to await instructions from his Government.

Sir C. Grey, who has been suffering from a broken leg, is doing well, and is able to attend to his official duties.

There is nothing of particular interest from any of the West India islands. The weather had been somewhat unsettled, rains and severe storms having been very frequent.

ST. VALENTINE'S DAY.

This day, 1846.

A lay—a lay for St. Valentine's Day,—
What lover or maiden can say "Nay!"
What virgin of fifty or Benedict thrifty
Would frown when Dame Nature begins to look gay?
When the sun and the birds are singing, and wild flowers springing,
And February flinging her "polka" away,
While the lark is high soaring,
The young lover adoring,
And chanting his sonnet on Valentine's Day.

Don't talk of St. George and his fight with the Dragon,
Talk not of St. Paddy who hit all the snakes,
St. Denis of France, or St. James of Arragon,
St. Taff, or the Saint of the Land of the Cakes;
Go, ransack the Calendar; where will you find me
A saintship so worthy, chivalric, and gay?
Deuil care and blue devilism I fling far behind me
When cheer'd by the smiles of St. Valentine's Day.

ELECTION FOR BUCKINGHAM.—The election of a member in the room of Sir Thomas Fremantle, who vacated the representation of this borough, took place on Wednesday, and resulted in the unopposed return of the Marquis of Chandos, the only son of the Duke of Buckingham. The election took place in the Townhall. The noble Marquis expressed his determined opposition to the plan of Sir R. Peel.

NEW CHURCH IN WESTMINSTER.—It is said that Miss Burdett Coutts has contributed the munificent sum of £30,000 towards building a new church in Westminster.

THE CIVIL WAR IN THE CITY.—On Monday, at the CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT, John Gardiner, Edward Jones, Joseph Hodges, and John Ireland (the first-mentioned being the captain of one of the Watermen's steam-boats, and the others in the service of the company), surrendered to answer an indictment, charging them with creating a riot upon the river Thames, and with assaulting several of the constables of the City police-force, while in the execution of their duty. We recently gave the particulars. Mr. Baron Rolfe told the Jury, in summing up, that the last nothing wanting to do away with the illegality of the proceeding adopted by the Lord Mayor, and even assuming it to have been illegal, a person would be guilty of a riot, in the eye of the law, if, in company with other persons, he acted in such a manner as to cause terror and alarm to her Majesty's subjects, even if it was to resist an illegal act. If the proceedings adopted against the defendants were illegal, the law gave them a remedy, and the Lord Mayor was as amenable to the law as for any humble individual, and they had no right to take the law into their own hands, and create a breach of the peace. The Jury, after a short deliberation, returned a verdict against Kinchin, Macka, Dadd, and Ireland, finding them guilty of the riot only, and acquitted Sinclair. Mr. Baron Rolfe sentenced Kinchin to be imprisoned for six weeks and the others for three weeks each.

INCENDIARISM IN NORTH DERBYSHIRE.—A destructive fire, which there is reason to believe to have been the work of an incendiary, broke out on Sunday morning, at Pedley Wood Farm, about eight miles from Chesterfield. The farm is situated in a very secluded place, no other house standing within a mile distance. It is in the occupation of Mr. Ford, and is the property of Degge Sitwell, Esq., of Stainsley. The fire consumed the out-buildings and valuable contents of the yard, consisting of several stacks of wheat, oats, hay, and a threshing machine; the total damage being estimated at from £600 to £900. The stock is, however, insured.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS—MONDAY.

THE PUBLIC WORKS (IRELAND) BILL, the second reading of which was moved by the Earl St. GERMANS, excited a discussion upon the general condition of Ireland, in the course of which the Duke of WELLINGTON expressed the desire of the Government to provide employment for the people of that country.—The second reading was agreed to, and the House adjourned at seven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—MONDAY.

It is hardly necessary to say that there was considerable excitement both in and out of the House to-day, in consequence of the commencement of the struggle upon the Corn-laws. The Strangers' Gallery was crowded long before the Speaker entered the House; and when the business at length commenced, there was a very large attendance of members, especially on the Opposition benches

NEW MEMBERS.—Lord Morpeth was introduced by Mr. Byng and Lord J. Russell, and took the oaths and his seat for the West Riding of Yorkshire. His Lordship was very much cheered. Mr. Macarthy also took the oaths and his seat for Cork

NEW WRIT.—On the motion of Mr. YOUNG, a new writ was ordered to be issued for the Southern Division of Nottinghamshire, in the room of the Earl of Lincoln, who has accepted the office of Secretary for Ireland.

CORN-LAW PETITIONS.—A vast number of petitions were presented upon the subject of the Corn-laws. Lord Morpeth brought up a heavy load of them. Among them was a petition from the Anti-Corn-law League, signed by 19,000; from Bradford, signed by 14,000; from Wakefield, Halifax, Huddersfield, Barnsley, Rotherham, and other places in the county of York, numbering in all 103 petitions, all of which, without exception, were strongly in favour of the plan proposed by her Majesty's Government, except in so far as they all asked for total and immediate repeal of the Corn-laws. Mr. W. B. FERRAND asked whether the signatures attached to petitions in favour of the measure had been the free and unbiassed acts of the parties signing (roars of laughter and ironical cheers from the Opposition benches)? because he was prepared to prove that the working men in many of the factories in the county of York were obliged to come into the counting-houses of the owners and sign.—Viscount MORPETH: To the best of my belief the signatures were all the true and independent acts of the parties. (Loud cheers.)

THE DEBATE UPON THE CORN-LAWS AND SIR ROBERT PEEL'S FINANCIAL CHANGES.

Sir ROBERT PEEL prefaced the discussion of the evening, by stating that he had made a mistake last week in supposing that it was usual for the Treasury to remit the duties, when once affirmed by the House of Commons. He found that in every case when the Speaker of the night honourable Baronet had enjoyed equal means of forming an opinion as to abundance or scarcity; and when he saw them refusing to open the ports, he could not help thinking that the right honourable Baronet ought to have the same confidence in them as he (Cheers.) The fact was, that the cause of protection had been long doomed in his mind, and potatoes were the last pretext for sealing its fate (Cheers.) People had been asked to look at the question as a whole: (Mr. P. Miles) was prepared on that very ground, to give it his decided opposition. He did not deny that from some parts of the plan the country might derive advantage, but moderate protection was at all times due to native industry, and he never would consent for more than was fair and just. He proposed his amendment, not merely on behalf of the agricultural interest but on behalf of all the interests of the country. He himself belonged to the landed interest, but he was equally engaged in all. Mr. Miles then spoke of the danger which would arise if this country became dependent upon foreigners for a supply of corn. He (Mr. P. Miles) must say that he had never been of opinion that the change now proposed by the right hon. Baronet would lead to the utter ruin of the agricultural interest, but he did believe that it tended to inflict severe distress upon the farmer, and that the labourer would suffer from a lower rate of wages, long before the operation of the measure affected the higher orders

Sir W. HEATHCOTE seconded the amendment.

Mr. W. LASCELLES expressed his intention to vote for the measure, as he considered it a satisfactory adjustment of this great question. Mr. Lascelles denied that the Conservative party had been reconstructed upon the principle of preserving a protective duty.

Lord NORREYS not only opposed the plan, but withdrew his confidence from Sir R Peel. He did not believe the right hon. Baronet acted dishonestly; but it was clear, from his declarations on former occasions, that he was originally a free trader, and was therefore unworthy of the confidence of public men. What Sir Robert Peel had formerly said to the honourable member for Edinburgh, was applicable to himself. The honourable member for Montrose (Mr. Hume) had even declared yourself in favour of those measures, in office you repeated the assurance that you were faithful to your principles. Will it suffice to answer, when your countenance inquires the cause of your remorse, "I gave you no pledges" declarations in abundance I admit, but pledges I utterly disclaim.' They will remind you that they lifted you, through their favour, to the councils of the empire. If their native tongue will be of service, you have taught them, by reminding me of former reproaches, where they may find, in the passionate exclamation of Dido, the fit expression of their sorrow

Nunc jam luda fides.

You remind of their entreaties you have nothing but the miserable answer of Æneas after all his coquetting in the cavern—

' Non nec in fœdera veni '

I gave you no pledges." That had been the language used by the right hon Baronet to his own supporters the other night. The measure would not be carried from conviction, but because members preferred the right hon. Baronet to the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell).

Mr. B. COCHRANE spoke in favour of going into Committee. The next speakers were Mr. Deedes, Sir J. Wash, and Mr. A. J. B Hope.

LORD SANDON made a strange speech. Much of the argument used in the first part of it was intended to prove that the measure was an ingenious one, and yet the noble Lord announced his intention to vote for it. He said he felt himself called upon to explain and vindicate the course which he was about to take with reference to this great question. He had an opinion of his own to express and illustrate, and it was very possible that it was not an opinion which was shared by any other member of that House. The fact was, he was about to support the Minister's measure, although he disapproved of it. (Laughter) In England the experiment a dangerous one—one unprecedented in any commercial country whatever the situation of the farmer being one of great peculiarity for in a year of universal plenty he could find no market for his property abroad, and would be undersold at home, in which case he would be at a loss what to do with a species of capital which could not easily be transferred to other purposes. With respect to the landlord, he thought little of him, for, if a farm could afford to bear it, but during the process of the impoverishment of the farmer, the labourer would be utterly ruined. His motive, under these circumstances, for voting for this measure was the conviction of the impossibility of maintaining protection against public opinion. Under this belief, he declined any further step, seeing the struggle that would be gone on, for even admitting that the plan brought forward by the right hon. gentleman. (Cheers.) But, Sir, I think it incumbent upon me to say, with regard to the mode in which he has introduced this, that a more unfair proposal never came before the House. Considering the opinion I had formed in December has been more and more strengthened by everything I have heard since the right hon. gentleman made his plan public in this House. (Hear, hear.) He could not, therefore, vote for any measure of competition to the English farmer, the danger will be far greater after the lapse of two or three years than it is at the present moment. (Hear, hear.) It so happens that, in the present year, we know, owing to the bad harvest in some of the countries in Europe, there is very little stock of corn remaining at Dantzic or Hamburg, or those parts of the Continent from which corn is usually introduced, and there is no reason to suppose that there is any great stock in the United States; there is, therefore, no apprehension on the part of the farmer. I would put it to the right hon. Baronet whether he will not reconsider that part of his plan? (Loud cheers.) The right hon. Baronet has frequently alleged, when bringing forward subjects of this importance, that it was almost impossible to know the exact effect of the duties proposed, until they had been by himself stated in this house, and the opinions of those who would be most affected by them taken and collected. It does appear to me, as far as I have heard, that with reason placed in the meantime, on account of the course which the right hon. Baronet intended, no doubt, as an advantage to the cultivator of the soil, the genera. opinion is that it would not be that advantage. (Loud cries of "Hear, hear.") But, as I have already said, I wish the plan or the right hon. gentleman to succeed; I wish to see his measure with respect to corn successful in this and the other House of Parliament, and no vote of mine shall tend in the least to endanger a measure of such a character. (Cheers.) If, therefore, when we come into Committee, the right hon. gentleman tells me that he has considered the representations made from various parts of the country, but that, upon the whole, he considers the delay of three years, and the duty to be imposed in the meantime, as sufficient for the protection, I, for my part, shall go out with the right hon. gentleman upon it. (Loud cheers.) There is another part of the subject which I certainly cannot approach with any great satisfaction, from the difficulty of treating it. The right hon. gentleman has proposed to give certain relief with respect to local burdens, and especially with respect to the expense of prisons and of prosecutions. I think those amendments in the law are, upon their own grounds, just; I think they are improvements in the existing law; I do not hear the right hon. gentleman say that they were offered as compensation, and I do not think any compensation of that kind could properly be offered. (Hear.) But I confess I do feel some difficulty, with respect to the general burdens of the country, the landed interest, the owners and occupiers of land, may not have more than the share that properly belongs to them." (Hear, hear.) Lord J. Russell, after some further remarks upon this branch of the subject, concluded thus:—"I concur in the general scheme of the right hon. gentleman. (Cheers.) I wish that the repeal had been immediate, instead of deferred (cheers), but, in the present state of affairs, seeing the attachment that there is on the part of a large portion of the community to this protective system, I think the advantage so great of getting rid of that system, as respects corn, in three years, and almost every other question giving way immediately afterwards, unless it be really some case which will bear argument, that I am unwilling to disturb in any way the settlement of this question. (Renewed cheers.) But I cannot forbear taking notice of one remark which fell from the hon. member for Wakefield (Mr. W. Lascelles), with regard to these plans proposed by the First Minister of the Crown. The hon. member said that, without meaning anything (I am sure he did not) disconcerting to those who are here, he thought the right hon. gentleman more able to carry these measures successfully than we were likely to be. Now, that is an observation which compels me to state that I do think that measures of the same kind would have been successfully carried, if the right hon. gentleman, and those who sit with him, had supported plans brought forward by those who are his political opponents, in the manner in which we supported plans brought forward by ours. (Cheers and counter-cheers.) This matter of Free-Trade and Protection, as it has been very justly stated, I think, by the hon. member himself, is not, properly, one of those questions which come within the province of party. When Sir Robert Peabody brought forward his plan, many of those who sat on his own side of the house were opposed to him; many of us who sat opposite to him gave him our support. Plans of moderating duties, and introducing a tendency towards Free-Trade, are not properly Whig plans; they are not exclusively Tory plans. (Hear, hear.) The right hon. gentleman opposite, when House Secretary, as I have always understood, and as he himself stated, acted most cordially with Mr. Huskisson in the promotion of those measures. But when the Whig party were in power, and Lord Althorp attempted a reduction of the timber duties, he was met by a party opposition. Lord Althorp, I think, was then acting according to their convictions that it would be for the benefit of their constituents that more free principles of commerce should be adopted. The hon. member for Wakefield is an honourable exception to that remark. (Hear, hear.) He voted, I believe—he frequently has—with my hon. friend the member for Wolverhampton, when he proposed those motions for the repeal of the Corn-laws, of which he is now about to see the triumph; and I congratulate my hon. friend on that success. (Cheers.) But I think it is to be lamented that the right hon. gentleman opposite, and those who with him had learned sound principles of commercial freedom, who had been colleagues with the friends of Mr. Huskisson, who could not be ignorant of those principles by which the trade of nations ought to be governed, who did not share in those principles which I think totally unsound and erroneous which have been supported by the Opposition to-night—it is to be lamented that they did unite in party votes in order to defeat plans founded on those sound principles. (Hear, hear.) My opinion is, that if that had not been the ground of opposition, if the Government of that day had been defeated in any other manner, and those who had been allowed to pass, much of the sufferings of 1842 and 1843 would have been avoided (hear); the right hon. gentleman would have avoided the hard trouble of the inventor and the reproach now cast upon him having betrayed somebody or other (hear, hear), which will make the poor man to get a better reward for his labour, which will increase the demand for all the productions of this country, and which, after these questions are settled, will have put on the way to the progressive improvement of the people of this country, hitherto prevented by their want of adequate means of comfort (cheers)

If the right hon. gentleman has the glory of carrying a measure fraught with such large and beneficial results, let me assure him he has good satisfaction that, out of office, we have associated together for the purpose of aiding and assisting the triumph of the Minister of the Crown. (Loud and continued cheering.)

Mr. Sheil and Mr. Herbert replied to the latter, the failure of the potato harvest in Ireland, and affirmed that the Government, in their inquiries, neither gave in to the panic, in the first instance, nor rushed into a fool's paradise, when it was ascertained that the destruction was not so great. He did not deny melancholy corroboration would be afforded of the extent of the ravages in the crop of what was the staple food of so large a portion of the population. But the disastrous effects of the late harvest were not confined to the potato crop. The inferior quality of the grain kept down the averages, and prevented the natural action of the Sliding-scale, and he frankly avowed his conviction that the law of 1842 had failed. There was this additional difficulty, that, while some continental countries were closing their ports, others, as Belgium, were permitting importation free; and we were thus cut off from our usual sources of supply. It was under these circumstances that he approved of an immediate opening of our ports, believing that in emergencies promptness of action was the safest policy, and knowing that if the Government at once assumed the responsibility, the battle was half won. He admitted that a repeal of the Corn-laws would have mainly come from Lord John Russell; and he, for one, was prepared to give his cordial support to the noble Lord, had he undertaken the settlement of the question. A great change was going on in the minds of farmers on the subject of protection; they were beginning to consider it as a landlords' question, and the same opinion was spreading amongst the agricultural population. Take the meeting at Canterbury, in the county of Wiltshire, that met on the 22nd inst., and the resolutions passed at it, bore the stamp of other minds than those of working men. But the statements of the working men themselves could not be ignored; they affirmed that no change could possibly place them in a worse position; and he knew that their condition was deplorable.

Sir E. INGLIS and Capt. FITZMAURICE then spoke

Past one o'clock, it was agreed that the debate should be adjourned; and the House broke up.

HOUSE OF LORDS—TUESDAY.

RELIGIOUS PERSECUTION IN RUSSIA.—Lord KINNAIRD called attention to the recently published cases of alleged religious persecution in Russia. Lord ABERDEEN said he had received no official information on the subject, and believed the popular version of the transaction was grossly exaggerated. The Emperor of Russia had pledged himself to have the case inquired into, and the delinquent punished.

Some petitions were presented on the subject of the Corn-laws, and the House, after sitting for about half-an-hour, adjourned till Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—TUESDAY.

NEW MEMBER.—The HON. J. A. S. Wortley, took the oaths and his seat for Buteshire.

A NEW WRIT FOR WESTMINSTER.—On the motion of Mr. YOUNG, a new writ was ordered for a member to serve in Parliament for the city of Westminster, in the room of the Hon. Captain H. J. Rous, who had accepted the office of one of the Commissioners of the Admiralty. (Laughter and loud cheers from both sides of the house.)

A great many petitions were presented for and against the Corn-laws. Among the latter were petitions, by Lord J. Russell, from the city of London, signed by 64,000 persons, praying for the total and immediate repeal of those laws.

THE ADJOURNED DEBATE.

The adjourned debate on the question of going into Committee to consider the Corn-law resolutions of the Government was resumed by Mr. STAFFORD O'BRIEN, who moved an amendment, to the effect that this day six months. He said that this country having been governed by party for so many years, and the gentlemen now in office having obtained their high position by party tactics, he should not consider they could abandon those who called them into power, and league with their enemies against them. The Government had not merely changed their opinions since their accession to office, but they had practically enforced the lesson that no principle could be a future bind parties together. The whole substance of the reason assigned by the Secretary at War for their departure from their former principles was that the law of 1842 had failed, and, therefore, Protection was to be altogether abandoned. But the Sidney Herbert of 1840 and the Sidney Herbert of 1846 were two distinct individuals, and the law of 1842, no matter how skilfully enacted, could hardly have been regarded as successful by two individuals of such opposite opinions. The question of Protection had been designated a mere matter of Customs' duties: a miserable attempt to disguise its real magnitude by a contemptuous phraseology! The abandonment of a great principle was defended on the ground of a temporary calamity, and that, too, without any proof that it would afford relief to the suffering which it was to palliate. Maxims of political economy were the arguments handled between the gentleman opposite and those who occupied the Treasury benches, and these formed the foundation of the measures propounded by a head of the Conservative Government. But let him apply those maxims to practical purposes. Suppose that, acting upon the axiom of buying in the cheapest and selling in the dearest market, he, a wealthy man in England, furnished his house with paper-hangings from Paris; suppose that he travelled in a continental carriage [illegible] as his earthenware from Germany; suppose all this, when he looked out of the window of a gaudy hackney coach, his fine-bloomed member what would he say? A vast multitude of unemployed, starving Englishmen. And what would they say to him? "We are poor English paper-stainers; we are Birmingham manufacturers; our trade has been taken away from us, what are we to do?" And what could he his reply? "My good fellows, I have done the best I could to make you idle—to take all employment out of your hands to leave you starving, but, believe me, I did it not from a bad motive. You see, in 1842 and 1845, January, 1846, it was proposed by her Majesty's Government, and received with cheers by the House of Commons, that labour should protect itself, and that political economy should for the future be my full play." The hon. gentleman remembered to argue that the great sufferers by the withdrawal of agricultural protection would be the small landowners and the tenant-farmers, and thus shadowed the point. He said: "Apply the principle of your new policy to the case of the farmer. Suppose prices fall in consequence—partly, perhaps, of an inundation of foreign corn—the tenant-farmer says to his landlord, 'I hope you will allow me a small abatement in my rent?' 'I may not know so much about farming as Mr. Smith, or Deanston; I may not have all the patent implements, nor blown the fattest pig; but my family has held under yours for many a generation; we have weathered hard years together; we have worn your colours—and we should be sorry to go elsewhere.' The landlord may reply, 'My good fellow, I am very sorry for you You have invested your capital in those drainings and those soils; but as have I. You have invested the money as I have—on the faith of a member of the Legislature. But we are told now by the Prime Minister, that we are "to buy in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest." There is a gentleman from the manufacturing districts, who, more candid than you, ready to act on his principles of free trade. I really must look to my own family arrangements. You talk of feudal times and days long gone by; you conjure up old exploded notions—and as for "colonies," my good fellow, there is no "new thing now!" Yes, indeed, we encamped on the shore, opposite a very remarkable rock in the lake, which had attracted our attention for many miles. It rose, according to our estimate, 600 feet above the water, and, from the point we viewed it, presented a pretty exact outline of the great pyramid of Cheops. Like other rocks along the shore, it seemed to be encrusted with calcareous cement. This striking feature suggested a name for the lake, and I called it Pyramid Lake; and, though it may be deemed by some a fanciful resemblance, I can undertake to say that the future traveller will find a much more striking resemblance between this rock and the Pyramids of Egypt than there is between them and the object from which they take their name.

"The elevation of this lake above the sea is 4890 feet, being nearly 700 feet higher than the Great Salt Lake, from which it lies nearly west, and distant about eight degrees of longitude. The position and elevation of this lake make it an object of geographical interest. It is the nearest lake to the western rim, as the Great Salt Lake is to the eastern rim, of the Great Basin which lies between the base of the Rocky Mountains and the Sierra Nevada; and the extent and character of which, its whole circumference and contents, it is so desirable to know."

The accompanying scene is striking—"the Pass of the Standing Rock"—with much of the romantic character of the ravine, scarcely trodden by civilisation.

A few days since, the following important communication, viewed with the Oregon dispute, appeared in the Times:

"Sir, Providing that the Americans agree to the proposal made by the British Government, allowing them the country south of the Columbia, the following valuable forts of the Hudson Bay Company will immediately fall into their possession:

"Fort George, on the Great Astoria, near the mouth of the river; Fort Umpqua, south of the American settlement, on the Umpqua River; Fort Hall, on the Snake River, purchased from Mr. Wyeth, of the American Fur Company, in 1837; Fort Baisse, in the Snake country; Fort Nezperces, on the Nezperces River, and Fort Colville, on the Columbia, with a large agricultural farm for supplying the hunting parties and outposts in the upper part of Columbia; they will likewise possess the extensive hunting grounds of the Snake and Flathead country, and if they can only bully the Britishers to give up Defuca Straits, they will then be in possession of Fort Vancouver, and the finest part of the country; they will have the plains between the Columbia and Defuca Straits, likewise the extensive plains at the top of Puget Sound, as well as the two splendid harbours in Defuca Straits, Port Discovery, which, to protect it from the north-west winds, has a large island, called, by Commander Broughton, Protection Island; in this harbour, I am informed, the Americans would like to establish their principal town. The other harbour is New Dungeness, which is almost equal, for shelter, to Port Discovery; in various parts of the straits the plains are beautiful. In describing Admiralty Inlet, which runs out of the straits, Captain Vancouver says, to describe the beauties of this region will, on some future occasion, be a very grateful task to the pen of a skilful panegyrist. ABORIGINES OF SOUTH AUSTRALIA.

On Monday, Jan. 26, two little boys, aborigines of South Australia, accompanied by Mr. Eyre, the Australian traveller, were introduced to the Queen and Prince Albert, at Buckingham Palace, by the Hon. W. E. Gladstone, Secretary for the Colonies. Her Majesty appeared much pleased with the general appearance and manners of these youthful representatives of her subjects at the antipodes, and both the Queen and Prince Albert asked numerous questions respecting them.

Both boys are between the ages of eight and ten, are well-formed, active, and intelligent. The colour of their skins is black, or very dark copper colour; their noses rather flattened, with indent below the forehead; and their mouths a little wide, with thickish lips; but the hair is fine, and of a glossy black, the eyes large and brilliant, the teeth good, and the general expression of the countenance pleasing and good-humoured.

They have been in England about eight months, and have already learnt to speak English very well. Their native names are "Warrulan," and "Pangkerin." The former is the son of a native of the Murray River, near Moorunde, named "Tenberry," who is the chief person among the aborigines inhabiting that district.

Tenberry has always been on the most friendly terms with Europeans, and it is to his influence and co-operation that they, in a great measure, owe the peaceful occupation of the Murray River, and the happy establishment of amicable relations with the once hostile, and much-dreaded tribes of the Murray, Rufus, and Darling Rivers.

When Mr. Eyre was about to quit South Australia, in December, 1844, Tenberry, with his family, and about 200 other natives of the Murray River, left their own district for Adelaide, to see that gentleman off, and to bid good-bye to the little Warrulan, the son of the chief person in their tribe, and who had been confided to Mr. Eyre's care by his parents. When the vessel was about sailing, most of the natives went on board the ship, to inspect the arrangements and accommodations, and to say farewell once more to those whom they hardly ever expected to see again.

The other boy, Pangkerin, has neither father nor mother alive. He was brought over to England under the care of Mr. Anthony Forster, with whom he had been living in the Colony for some time previously, but in the same vessel as Warrulan. Pangkerin does not belong to the same tribe as the other boy, but to a contiguous one; both, however, speak the same dialect, with slight variation.

After their interview with the Queen, the boys expressed a good deal of disappointment at the absence of all state or show attending Majesty. They had, a few days previously, seen the Queen going in procession to open Parliament, surrounded by carriages and troops, and with all the parade and pageantry of Royalty. When, therefore, they saw a very young person dressed like any other lady, with but few attendants, they could not believe it possible that it could be the same Queen; she was too young, they thought, for a Queen; they admired the tall manly figure of Prince Albert, with his well-developed mustachios.

The aboriginal races of Australia have hitherto been much misrepresented and misunderstood, and have too often been depicted as the lowest and most degraded of mankind; forming, as it has been asserted, only a connecting link between the human family and the lower orders of the creation. This opinion is, however, as unjust as it is unfounded; for though the natives of Australia are not far advanced in the scale of civilisation, they have as great natural intelligence as, and an equal capacity for improvement with, other races. Their children, as far as they have yet been tried, have been found fully as apt and quick in learning as those of Europeans.

The two little Australians now in England have been examined by several eminent phrenologists, and their developments are said to be very good, and far superior to those of the negro race generally.

It is to be hoped that the presence of these youths in England, and the honourable notice her Majesty has been pleased to take of them, will go far towards removing the unfavourable impressions heretofore entertained of the race; and, by creating an interest on behalf of a people little known and greatly misunderstood, perhaps tend, in some degree, towards inducing better-directed, and more effectual, attempts to mitigate the evils which our occupation and possession of their country necessarily inflict upon them.

AUSTRALIAN BOY.

Mr. Eyre, who has had much experience in Australia, and who now holds the office of Resident Magistrate at the Murray River, in South Australia, has recently* published a long and full account of the aborigines of that country, to which the reader may be referred for further or more detailed accounts of the physical appearance, character, habits, manners, customs, and pursuits of this interesting people.

THE MEDAL FOR CHINA.

The Medal to be distributed to the officers and soldiers, who served in China, during the late war, is now in course of being struck at the Royal Mint, from a die by Mr. Wyon, the Engraver-in-chief. There will be required 18,000: they are all to be of silver (intrinsic value about 5s. 6d.); no difference being made between those to be presented to the officers and those to be given to the men. The Medal is about half the size represented in the present column. It is, certainly, a fine work of art, and will add even to Mr. Wyon's high reputation. It bears a portrait of her Majesty, an excellent likeness: on the Royal brow, is the tiara: the legend is, "Victoria Regina." The likeness is strikingly beautiful, and the relief admirably executed. On the reverse, is a picturesque group of the weapons of the army and navy, resting under the shadow of a palm-tree: in front of the weapons are the armorial bearings of Great Britain. Above the group are the words "Armis exposcere pacem;" and underneath the arms, is the word "China," and the date of the War, "1842." On the rim are inscribed the name and regiment. "The ribbon," (it is stated in the "Art Union,") "is to be of scarlet, with a yellow border, the scarlet denoting the colour of England, and the yellow being the Imperial colour of China. The Medals will probably be issued to the soldiers and sailors about the middle of the year."

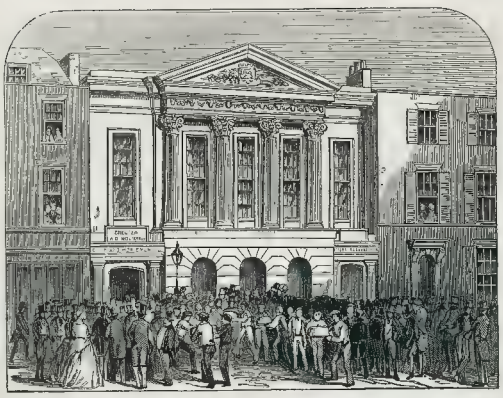
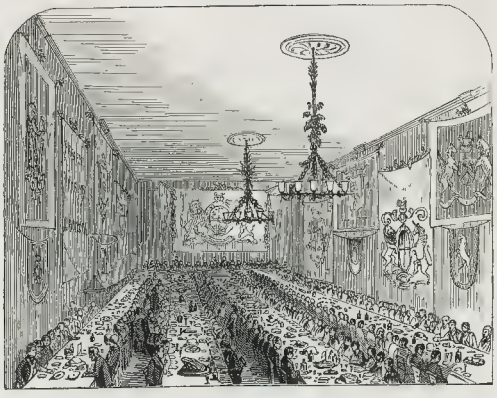
OPENING OF THE SOUTH-EASTERN RAILWAY TO CANTERBURY.

THE RAILWAY ACROSS ST. DUNSTAN'S-STREET, CANTERBURY.



EXTERIOR OF THE CORN EXCHANGE.



THE DINNER IN THE CORN EXCHANGE.

THE CANTERBURY STATION.

OPENING OF THE SOUTH-EASTERN RAILWAY TO CANTERBURY.

Yesterday week, the Opening of a Branch Line of Railway from Ashford, on the South-Eastern Railway, to Canterbury, was celebrated at the latter town. The new line of Railway branches off from the main trunk of the South-Eastern Railway at the Ashford station, and, passing through a richly-wooded, fertile, and picturesque country, through Wye and Godmersham, leads on to Canterbury, which is a distance of about 15 miles from the trunk line.

Nothing can exceed the beauty of the country about the little village of Godmersham; and there can be little doubt but that the antiquities of Canterbury, added to these beauties, will for many years to visit that ancient city.

The ceremonial of the opening exerted considerable interest throughout the line. At Ashford station, and also at the different villages between that place and Canterbury, numbers of people were collected to see the carriages pass. At Canterbury, a vast concourse of persons was assembled along the line, composed for the most part of the fairer and more curious sex. It was odd to see the multitude of female faces, with only here and there a man; it seemed as if the whole female population of Canterbury had turned out to greet the visitors.

At an early hour a large number of the directors and shareholders of the line assembled at the Bricklayers' Arms station; and, shortly after ten o'clock, a special train left that station for Ashford, (sixty-seven miles from London), which was reached at twenty-five minutes to two. There an excellent brass band entered an open carriage attached to the train, and enlivened the proceedings with their cheerful music; a large addition was also made to the company and the carriages. The latter now amounted to eighteen, which gave the appearance of a pretty formidable train. The weight was something above 300 tons, and drawn by two engines, the Orion and the Mars, constructed by Messrs. Sharpe and Roberts. The driving wheels are 5ft. 6in. in diameter—the wheels are coupled, and the engines are not powerful ones. The train arrived at Canterbury at half-past two o'clock; and the company proceeded, at once, to the Corn Exchange, to celebrate the event of the day by a public dinner, announced for three o'clock. On the company arriving at the Exchange, an amateur shot presented itself. The cooks and the waiters had possession of the Dining-Hall, and a somewhat hasty arrangement was made to place the dishes before the guests were admitted. The dinner was furnished by the proprietor of the Rose Inn, immediately opposite the Exchange; and a gangway was formed across the street, the various dishes of soup and fish for 300 persons being passed, like buckets at a fire, from hand to hand with the greatest steadiness and gravity for about twenty minutes, the guests lining each side of the gangway, and looking on with much patience and good humour at the interesting proceeding. (Our Artist has represented this singular scene.) Everything at the dinner was of the best description, and did great credit to its providers. There was abundance also of excellent wine.

The Dining-Hall was hung round with a number of banners and flags, and was ornamented with evergreens. (See the Engraving.)

Mr. Henry Cooper, the Mayor of Canterbury, occupied the chair. To the right and left of the chair sat the Dean of Canterbury, Viscount Torrington, Mr. William Feilden, M.P.; Mr. Dodd, M.P.; Mr. N. Knatchbull, Colonel Middleton, Colonel Piper, the Mayor of Hythe, Major Bennett and the officers of the 17th Lancers, and other gentlemen.

The usual loyal toasts having been given from the chair and duly honoured, "The Archbishop and Clergy of the Diocese" was proposed, and acknowledged by the Very Rev. the Dean of Canterbury. The toast of "The Army and Navy" was acknowledged by Colonel Middleton, who, in the course of his speech, alluded to the facilities which railways will give for concentrating the military forces at any one point where their presence may be needed.

The Chairman then rose to propose the toast of the day. He said the event they were met to commemorate was likely to tend to the advantage, not only of the city of Canterbury, but also of the south-eastern part of the country. The directors of the railroad had most handsomely met the landed proprietors, and had liberally remunerated such ideals who had suffered losses from the line of railroad. He concluded with proposing "The health of Mr. M'Grigor, the Chairman of the Board of Directors."

Mr. M'Grigor, in acknowledging the toast, paid a high compliment to Mr. Joseph Cubitt for the manner in which he had completed the work. So long, too, as the great work between Folkestone and Dover continued, the name of Mr. William Cubitt, his father, would be heard with respect. Mr. M'Grigor concluded a very interesting address by proposing the "Health of the Mayor." Several other toasts were then drunk.

In the course of the evening Mr. M'Grigor announced intelligence received by the electric telegraph, that the Treasury per cent bonds closed at 97½; that Exchequer Bills were at 38s. to 40s. premium, and that the office of the Court of Chancery for the receipt of railway deposits had closed at three o'clock that day, and that upwards of £1,000 sterling had been received. The Directors of the Bank of England and the Government, by their firmness and wise measures, had accomplished this great financial measure. This announcement was received with great cheering.

The meeting shortly after broke up, at nine o'clock, and the special train left in about half an hour for London, and reached London at half-past one in the morning.

This new line of Railway is intended to extend to Margate and Ramsgate. The portion opened, is only fifteen miles, from Ashford to Canterbury. On leaving the main line, which goes on to Dover, the branch bearing to the left, commences with a sharp curve of a quarter of a mile radius, and enters into a pretty stiff cutting, nearly forty feet in depth. A short distance further on, and about 2½ miles from Ashford, Eastwell Park, the beautiful seat of the Earl of Winchilsea, appears on the left. A slight curve leads us to the village of Wye, about four miles from Ashford. Wye Church is an object of some beauty, and the town has gained some notoriety in the neighbourhood on account of its Grammar School, which has produced several men of eminence.

At five miles from Ashford, Olantigh, the seat of Colonel Sawbridge, on the right of the line, is worthy of observation. A little further on, and on the opposite side of the line, we see Godmersham, a noble park-like park.

This portion of the line deserves particular notice, for here occur the deepest cutting and the highest embankment on the line: the cutting is about 83 feet in depth; it is through the crest of a curve of a mile in length; the highest embankment follows immediately afterwards, and is about a mile long. We here enter another chalk cutting, about 30 feet in depth, with a nearly upright face. A curve of half an inch radius, and with a five-foot straight line, to the station of Chilham, the only station at present on the line. It is nine miles from Ashford, six from Canterbury, and seventy-six miles from London. In twenty eight feet cutting we pass the village of Chilham-street on the left, and the town of Chartram on the right. Soon after, near Milton Chapel Bridge, the line passes under a handsome red brick skew viaduct of three arches, which crosses over the old road from Canterbury to Ashford. We here cross the river Stour, which is crossed by the line no less than five times, by timber bridges, with wooden girders, trussed with wrought-iron bars. A slight curve in about fifteen feet cutting, brings us up to St. Dunstan's-street, Canterbury, which is passed on a level. We are now at the station. It is constructed for four lines, and is between St. Dunstan's and Whitestable Harbour, which it crosses on a level. The roof of the station is of iron; it is of a peculiarly light and graceful construction, and is supported by iron columns.

Among the provisions on the line for public safety, the following merit detail:—Every station is provided with large signal posts from 20 feet to 30 feet high, each, with two semaphore arms and two powerful parabolic reflecting lamps, 9 inches in diameter, showing an intense light. The semaphore telegraph forms a very striking day object, and the colour of the light and height of the posts render them distinct at night also, for any of the stations lights in their vicinity; and where no curves intervene signals can be given for two or three miles, if necessary. The junction signals are upon the same plan, only that the parabolic reflecting lamps are 12 inches in diameter, instead of 9 inches. The alteration of the light from red to green on the reverse is effected by the signal man, who simply has to place his foot on a treadle, at the same time he has the levers of the shifting rails in his hand, and he performs at once the two operations of shifting the points to admit the engine from the main line to the branch, and from the branch to the main line, as the case may be, and of signalling the engine driver to advance in the right direction. Having given the signal to pass, he removes his foot from the stirrup, and the machinery adjusts itself again to the stoppage signal.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED

REAR-ADMIRAL SAMUEL C. ROWLEY.

Admiral Rowley, who died at the close of last week, at his seat in Ireland, aged 70, entered the service early youth, and was Lieutenant of the Vanguard in 1794, when that vessel formed part of the squadron engaged in the reduction of the French West India Islands. When Lieutenant of the Astrea, he participated in the brilliant action with La Loire, which terminated in the capture of the French frigate. In 1795, Mr. Rowley served in Lord Bridport's action; and in 1801, commanded the Terror, at Copenhagen.

HENRY GALLY KNIGHT, ESQ., M.P., OF LANGOLD, NOTTS.

Mr. Gally Knight, whose death occurred on the 9th inst., aged fifty-three, was only son of the late Henry Gally Knight, Esq., Barrister-at-Law, by Selina, his wife, sister of Lord St. Helens, and grandson of the Rev. Henry Gally, D.D., Chaplain in Ordinary to George II., distinguished among the literati of his day, who married Elizabeth, only sister and heir of Ralph Knight, Esq., of Langold, and granddaughter of Sir Ralph Knight, of Langold, the Parliamentarian. The Gallys were one of those refugee families which sought an asylum in England on the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. Mr. Gally Knight succeeded to his extensive estates in 1808, and was first elected for Nottinghamshire in 1835. In the literary world he acquired considerable reputation, and published, on his return from travelling in Greece, Syria, &c., a volume of poems, under the title of "Eastern Sketches." He was married to Henrietta, youngest daughter and coheir of Anthony Hardolph Eyre, Esq., of Grove, but has not left any child.

THE REV. CHRISTOPHER WORDSWORTH, D.D.

This distinguished divine, formerly Dean of Bocking, and Master of College, Cambridge, younger brother of William Wordsworth, the poet, was born in the North of England, near the lakes now so associated with his brother's muse, on the 9th of June, 1774; and died at Buxted Parsonage, Sussex, of which parish he was rector, on the 1st inst. In learning, Dr. Wordsworth was long known as the estimable Master of Trinity College, and in theology, as the able author of "Ecclesiastic Biography."

He married, 6th of October, 1804, Priscilla, daughter of Charles Lloyd, Esq., of Birmingham, and has left issue, John, Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge; Charles, Second Master of Winchester College; and Christopher, the learned Master of Harrow.

THOMAS WHITMORE, ESQ., OF APLEY.

Mr. Whitmore, chief of the great family of Whitmore, which has, for a long series of generations, held extensive estates, and considerable political influence, in the county of Salop, succeeded to the Apley property at the decease of his father, Thomas Whitmore, Esq., M.P., in 1799, and served the office of High Sheriff in 1805. He also had a seat in Parliament for Bridgnorth, of which borough he was Recorder, and he was also lay Dean of the Royal Peculiar.

By Catherine, his wife, only daughter and heiress of Thomas Thomasson, Esq., of York, Mr. Whitmore has left three sons and three daughters; of whom the eldest son, Thomas Charlton Whitmore, Esq., M.P., is married to the Lady Louisa Anne Douglas, daughter of the Marquis of Queensbury; and the eldest daughter, Catherine Mary, to Francis, Viscount Bernard.

At the period of his death, which occurred recently, Mr. Whitmore had completed his 82nd year.

The family from which he derived, can be traced on the ancient rolls of the Manor of Claverley to the time of Henry III., and various members of it have, at different epochs, been of distinction in the civic annals of London. The famed Lord Mayor in 1631, was Sir George Whitmore, of Balmes, a devoted Royalist, and a severe sufferer in the civil wars. The Republican newspaper, Certain Information, for the 30th January, 1643, relates that Sir George Whitmore, Alderman, and others, were carried by sea to Yarmouth, because they would not contribute monies for the defence of the King and Parliament," as destroying the Monarchy was then called. On Frances Lady Whitmore, a celebrated beauty of her day, Dryden wrote one of his most exquisite epitaphs.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1846.

The Debate of the past week has not proved so animated or so stirring as it was expected it would be: the number of Conservative Members who have intimated their intention to support the Ministerial Plan is so considerable, that the process of conversion, it is evident, has been very active in the ranks of the party. As all these have to avow a great "change of opinion," the speeches abound in renunciation; they are filled either with the confession of past errors, or declarations of the necessity of yielding to the pressure of the time, to a mode of argument, and as the subject so great a change, has rarely been witnessed in all the long and varying history of party. Tempora mutantur, is the one common assertion; the nos mutamur in illis, is the as common and invariable confession accompanying it; the plea of necessity, and the excuse founded on having yielded to it, follow each other like cause and consequence. The whole Legislature seems by one accord to have suddenly awakened to a sense of a mournful fact—that all its past policy has been a mistake; one of the Ministry boldly says the "law of 1815 was the greatest error ever committed." Extraordinary in its duration has been the reign of that error: were the instincts of the people of that time truer in their conclusions than the calm foresight of our greatest if not wisest statesmen? The people resisted the passing of that law, even to the extreme of riot and bloodshed: thirty years have elapsed, and those who sit in the same seat of authority avow that the poor, ignorant, misguided mob of 1815 was wiser than they, in all but its violence. Alas, for the pride of office! for it is sadly rebuked. Let what will be the recompense—station, influence, power—it must cost a pang to make the acknowledgment of error so warmly advocated, so strongly defended, so recently perceived. What can it be, men are tempted to ask, that can have held them so long enthralled? Did some Agricultural Puck squeeze the juice upon their eyes so strongly that they have for generations been in love with and caressing deformity, and only wake now beneath the cold breath of coming famine to avow, like Titania, the grossness of their "error?" Whatever may be the cause, the effect is certain; we have the glaring facts before us of past perseverance in a course now utterly abandoned, with almost abject avowals that it was the worst one. We must take the penitents on their own word, and believe what is indeed the most credible, that they have all been under a delusion; insanavimus omnes; but the disease is very curable, and the House of Commons, during the present week, has presented many almost miraculous cases of recovery.

In these conversions, Sir Robert Peel will find an accession of strength beyond what he could have reasonably have calculated upon. At one time the Thanes seemed to fly from him, and it appeared as if he would have been rescued from his perilous position by the aid of his enemies alone. But this was while uncertainty perplexed all with that fear of change, which is far more difficult to bear with composure than the perfect knowledge of all that is to occur. Since the plan has been made known, the meetings to oppose it have been less numerous, the proceedings less determined. True it is that many support it in doubt and fear, more convinced of the necessity of the change than its wisdom, more certain that a settlement of the question is required, than that it is the best settlement which might be made—but still they do support it. Some—but they are fewer—even retain all their opinions against the policy of the Premier—believe firmly that it will ruin the nation, and yet declare they will give it all the effectual aid they can afford it, by recording their vote in its favour! We can understand the total and avowed, though tardy, converts—we can imagine men not quite assured, doubting, and yet unwilling to oppose a great change; but those who at once denounce by word and promote by deed we confess we cannot understand. By their own confession they do evil without even the consolation of thinking that good may come of it.

The many resignations of seats that have taken place, it is remarkable, are made by members who declare that they must give their votes with the Premier; but, as they have made declarations to their constituents, amounting, nearly, if not entirely, to the distinctness and binding force of pledges, they feel compelled to surrender their trust, and submit themselves to re-election, under the avowal of the newer doctrines they have embraced. Some have done so voluntarily; others have been induced to declare their intentions by the "request of friends," which, in some cases, is impossible to withstand. But the result of all the explanations and declarations is, that more support is given to the present measures, among the Premier's own party, than was expected some weeks ago; and, even those who oppose them, do so in a tone of regret, and of reproach, that they acknowledge to be unavailing; and a body, the dissentients speak like men yielding to an inevitable destiny; remonstrating with the Fates, like the chorus of a Greek tragedy, they tear at the chains they have no means of resisting, and, though they yield, as to a greater and supernatural power, they no less strongly accuse its injustice. Nearly all the speeches have partaken of this tone; they are burdened with reproaches against those whose present course stands in such strong contrast with past declarations; it must be confessed, there is deep cause for complaint on the part of those who still "stand upon the ancient ways," in which they were so long misled by leaders who have now deserted them. But the accused parties meet all the censure cast upon them with great nerve; we have changed our opinions, "and there is an end of it," as Sir James Graham said. After that, vain are all quotations from Hansard; useless all the rakings up of former speeches from that too faithful record.

> Oh! ever-falling trust
> In mortal strength; and, oh! what not in man,
> Deceivable and vain.

The question then comes to be decided upon the only remaining grounds left to a statesman after he abandons all attempts at consistency: that is a question to be settled between him and his supporters. The changed circumstances of the country, the necessity of the time—these must be their warrant for the ruler who has to provide for the safety of the whole empire. He must interpret the code of political and party morality far more widely than if he only had the success of his own party to consult, and its ascendancy to secure. But this has not yet been recognised as the system of government. From certain men we have been accustomed to expect measures of a certain tendency; when this is reversed, a perplexity of feeling is caused that will continue to be manifested, till we learn to regard our leaders as on a complete body, bound to deliberate on measures only, without regard to the men who frame them. The present policy may be the beginning of a new era, and the evident tendency of the age is to wear down the distinctions of party. The last century and a half witnessed the struggles for ascendancy of names and men; the coming time will not be contented with champions and symbols. We are a practical generation, and will accept nothing but action.

Since the acquittal of Capt. Johnstone, on the ground of insanity, much discussion has been raised as to the justice of the verdict. The Jury were, perhaps, more merciful than discriminating, since no proof of insanity was given, and no evidence offered of any hereditary taint of that dreadful disease having appeared in the prisoner's family. It was alleged by the counsel of the accused, in the defence; but the statement of the hired advocate should never be allowed to supersede direct evidence.

But, we have no wish to impugn a judicial decision, except so far as it may furnish an example of laxity in judicial practice: proof—whether of crime, or innocence of crime—can never be too strong. Since the verdict was given, however, a letter has been published, stating a fact respecting Mr. Lloyd and Captain of the Tory, which increases the surprise that all must have felt, that a whole crew of men should have submitted so tamely to be hacked and hewed to death by a drunken and ungovernable maniac. That no attempt was made to depose the Captain from the command (which has frequently been done in similar cases), seems astonishing. But, after the murder of the mate, the poor men had no head or leader, and were probably afraid to incur the charge of the very crime they were suspected by the wretched Captain to be always contemplating. Mutiny is so serious an offence, that men are afraid to commit themselves by anything that looks like it, and, besides, cannot always trust each other; thus they submit to authority, even after they are morally and legally absolved from the duty of obedience; something like this seems to have influenced the crew of the Tory. But it is most deplorable to find, as we do from the letter above alluded to, that the unfitness of the master to be trusted with command was seen by an officer of her Majesty's brig Syren, before the Tory sailed from Singapore, and yet to hear that no steps were or could be taken to prevent that outbreak of violence, which was at least probable, and the result of which has been so horribly tragical. The letter states that the illfated ship was boarded in consequence of "a message sent by night from the Tory to her Majesty's brig Syren, requesting assistance, as there was mutiny on board her. These sent found nothing wrong on board the Tory, but the master in a state of extraordinary excitement; and they regretted much at the time that no power ex-lated of suspending him from his charge, which would have prevented the subsequent horrors."

We believe that in certain cases naval officers can perform some of the functions of British Consuls, and interfere magisterially between the masters and crews of merchantmen. It might perhaps be of advantage if those powers were better defined or made more extensive.

Little or no power is given to governors, consuls, or commanders of her Majesty's ships to interfere with the masters of merchant ships abroad, and we sometimes meet them in a state dangerous to the owners' property and lives of the crew, and disgraceful to the flag they bear, without being able to give them anything but good advice.

As this is an article generally thrown away whenever it is given, it might be as well to consider whether, as the letter suggests, more power to act as well as to advise could not be granted.

SOME rather important political changes have taken place during the week. Lord Lincoln has been appointed Chief Secretary for Ireland, in the room of Sir Thomas Fremantle. The noble Earl has addressed his constituents in South Nottinghamshire, and speaks with confidence of his re-election. He is, however, to be opposed by Mr. Hildyard, who offers himself on Protection principles. Captain Rous has been appointed a Lord of the Admiralty, so that there will be another election for Westminster. It will be recollected that the gallant Captain, a short time since, announced his conversion to the principles of Free-Trade. The office of Groom of the Stole to Prince Albert, which was vacant by the resignation of the Marquis of Exeter, has been accepted by a Whig—the Marquis of Abercorn. It is stated in well-informed quarters that the Duke of Northumberland intends to give his cordial support to Sir Robert Peel's proposals. Lord Canning is to succeed the Earl of Lincoln as Chief Commissioner of Land Revenues.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The Universal German Gazette announces from Palermo, 19th ult., that on that day the Prince Royal of Wurtemberg and the Grand Duchess Olga were solemnly affianced to each other in the Greek chapel of the palace of Olanzzo. The Empress of Russia, who was present, is said to be so much recovered as now to be out of danger

The Journal des Débats publishes the following letter from Vienna:—"Within the memory of man we have not had such a mild winter as the present, or, more properly speaking, we have had no winter at all. The temperature is generally 14 degrees. The trees are in blossom; almost every person has resumed summer clothing, and the promenades are as much frequented as in the summer season."

Letters from Florence of the 27th ult. state, that the extradition of M. Renzi had caused a very unfavourable impression in Tuscany. Placards had been posted up in the streets of Florence denouncing death against the Ministers. The Grand Duke, visibly affected by those demonstrations, had left for La Maremma, a district situate along the Mediterranean, where he was still on the 27th.

The Augsburg Gazette of the 2nd states that the police of Tuscany have arrested, at Leghorn, a coffee-house-keeper, in whose house they found a correspondence with the conspirators of the Romagna. Several other arrests were made after the discovery. The same journal states that a police agent has been assassinated at Ancona.

According to the latest accounts from the canton of Berne, the population had declared, by an immense majority, in favour of the convocation of a constituent assembly. The excitement was very great; trees of liberty had been planted on different points.

The following reply was given by the King of Bavaria to an address of thanks presented to him by 1000 Catholics of Augsburg: "It is agreeable to my heart to receive the expression of the sentiments contained in that address, the more so that in place of gratitude discontent is the order of the day. Having frequently experienced much ingratitude, the thanks of the Catholic citizens of Augsburg are the more pleasing to me, as I protect Catholics and Protestants in their constitutional rights, and I feel interested in conducing to the happiness of both with the same paternal love."

The Frankfort Journal confirms the reports lately received from the Caucasus of the taking of several Circassian villages, according to a letter of a Russian officer. The Russian army was not allowed the least repose. The soldiers were under arms night and day.

A letter from Constantinople, of the 20th ult., states that the Porte, on the repeated application of the Russian Ambassador, has decided on arresting six emissaries of Schamyl Bey, who have been recruiting for him at Van and Schabir, for the war in the Caucasus. The same letter informs us, that Mehemet Bey, eldest son of Reschid Pacha, has been appointed Governor and Supporter of the office of the Ameyh. Mehemet Bey was a long time in Paris, and speaks French fluently.

The Seaflick, of Liverpool, a vessel which was engaged in the African trade, has been struck by lightning on the coast of Africa. The storm was one of the most dreadful ever experienced, even on that fiery coast, and soon after the Seaflick was struck she was found to be in flames. In a short time the upper deck and crew were compelled to take to the boat, and leave the ship to her fate. They remained in the boat for eight days suffering the greatest hardships, but were at length so fortunate as to reach Sierra Leone.

A letter from Berlin says that the South German States have reduced their demands respecting a duty on prints from six dollars to five, with the condition of a drawback of three dollars on cotton manufactures exported. The proposal is not likely to be acceded to at Berlin, Prussia preferring to let things remain as they are, if the South German States cannot be induced to come to its own terms.

A letter from Stockholm, dated Jan. 30, says:—"The mild weather which we have had for a considerable time, has been suddenly interrupted by severe cold. On the 26th, in the evening, the mercury fell to 14 degs. below zero, and the next morning to 18 degs. At Gefle, on the 27th, it was at 21 degs. below zero."

Several of the Paris journals have copied a dramatic recital from a German paper, stating that the King of Prussia, pursued by his Grand Huntsman in having commenced a chase without waiting for his Majesty, had spit in his face, and that the huntsman, after first half drawing the sword, and then returning it again into its scabbard, had taken a pistol from his belt and shot himself. This anecdote has one drawback—it is entirely devoid of truth. The Frankfort journals positively and officially contradict the story.

We learn from Dresden, 28th ult., that the Elbe was still rising with frightful rapidity, although it had already attained 13 feet above its ordinary level, and inundated the country near its banks. The mass of water from the incessant rain and heat much increased by the melting of the snow on the mountains of Bohemia and Saxony. At Hamburg, three of the finest of the custom house stores are in such imminent danger from the floods that the quays were crowded with people expecting to see them thrown down. The facade of the Exchange Hotel had fallen, and several magnificent plate glass windows were invaded by the Alster, which was becoming more and more swollen.

The line of railway from Dusseldorf to Dinsburg, was opened on the 8th inst. with great solemnity. Several speeches were delivered on the occasion, amongst others, one by the chairman of the Cologne and Minden Railway, of which the above line is a section.

Considerable agitation prevails at present in the grand duchy of Baden, on account of a motion recently made by a member of the Legislature in favour of religious freedom. During the debate on the 4th instant, the public galleries of the Chamber of Deputies were ordered to be cleared, in consequence of the noise and confusion which reigned there, and the loud expression of opinion for and against the motion. Herr Zitzel, the author of the motion in question, has received the thanks of several deputations from various parts of Germany, among others, from this city

We learn from Saxe Gotha, that the States were assembled on the 4th inst. for the first time since the accession of the Duke. The only remarkable passage in his opening speech was that in which he expresses a desire to give to his people a constitution more in conformity with their interests and the spirit of the age.

Shortly after the death, a few months ago, of the Marquis de Saint Léger, at Limoges, there was found concealed in various parts of his house a sum of 120,000f. in silver. The heirs, 10 in number, resolved therefore not to sell the house, but to pull it down, in the expectation of finding more concealed treasure. The demolition is now going on, in presence of one or more of the heirs. 60,000 francs in gold have already been found concealed in various parts of the building, under beams &c.

The Universal Gazette of Prussia publishes accounts from St. Petersburgh of the 30th ult., from which it appears that the Emperor, in consideration of the total failure of the crops in the Government of Smolensk, had ordered that the conscription which ought to take place in 1845 in that province should be put off till the following year.

A letter from Rome, dated 26th January, mentions that on the 23rd the Treasury had borrowed two millions of scudi of the house of Torlonia, on very advantageous terms. Orders had been issued to increase the guadarmeria to nearly half as much more, a measure which has been generally approved.

The Ville de Cracdebec has arrived at Havre from St. Domingo, which she left on the 6th ult. At that date the war continued between the French and Spanish portions of the island, but nothing new of importance had occurred. The captain of the Ville de Cracdebec has brought with him the copy of a letter, addressed by the President to the French Consul General, justifying his conduct towards M. Dubrac, who, he says, had been engaged in attempts to sow the seeds of civil war between the blacks and the other natives.

POSTSCRIPT.

SERIOUS RIOTS AT PENRITH.

The town of Penrith, Cumberland, and vicinity, was, on Tuesday and Wednesday the scene of serious riots, which originated among the navies employed on the Lancaster and Carlisle line of Railway. The English navies were unwilling to allow the Irish to work on the same part of the line. The poor Paddies having been beaten and obliged to run for their lives, proceeded down to Plumpton, where there were some hundreds of their countrymen, all working peaceably together. As soon as the boys from the slater kingdom were acquainted with the cause of their retreat, there was a universal strike, and a simultaneous marshalling in arms. A council of war was then held, and it was unanimously agreed, that Barney Flanagan should be general, and that, under his command, they would attack the English on the Yanrath Cut (not far distant from the spot where the famed battle of Clifton Moor was fought in 1745), the ranks were formed, the march commenced in military state; but ere they arrived at the huts on Yanrath Moor, the Lankey navies had all fled.

J. W. Hassel, Esq., Colonel of the Westmoreland and Cumberland Yeomanry Cavalry, with other magistrates, proceeded to the place of rendezvous. Mr. Hassel reasoned with the hostile corps, and endeavoured to bring things to an amicable settlement; but their leader, in reply, said they would fight while there was a man of them alive, sooner than bear the insults of the English. As there was every mien of illegal slaughter, the cavalry were ordered to be in readiness; this was on Tuesday night. On Wednesday morning, about 1000 English navies from Kendal, and other southern parts of the line, came into Penrith, armed with hook-shafts, spades, hammers, &c.; they proceeded down to Plumpton, but the alarm had been given, and the Irish had fled, with the exception of a few who were lying in ambush behind the hedges, and who were put up like hares, and hunted by the ferocious Lankeys

About twelve A.M., the principal part of the English returned to Penrith, and about two P.M., it was announced that the Irish were coming to meet them. Three troops of yeomanry cavalry mounted and proceeded to the town-head to prevent them from entering. While the cavalry were thus engaged, the Lancashire navies forced their way into a lodging-house and commenced beating eight Irishmen in a most barbarous and cowardly manner (two of them are said to be past recovery); the police were on the spot, but being overpowered with numbers, their resistance was useless. However, just at this crisis, a detachment of cavalry, headed by Sir George Musgrave, Bart., of Eden Hall, galloped up, the navies fled in all directions, and the cavalry succeeded in driving them out of the town, without being under the necessity of firing upon them.

REPRESENTATION OF DERBYSHIRE.—Lord Ashley declines to contest the representation of Derbyshire, on the ground of the expense

LONDON AND BIRMINGHAM RAILWAY.—A meeting of this Company was held yesterday (Friday), at the Euston Station. The report gave a satisfactory account of the Company's affairs, as the receipts were increasing. A dividend of 10 per cent. from the common fund of the Amalgamated Company was declared, clear of Property-tax.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

RESIGNATION OF ANOTHER ASSISTANT POOR-LAW COMMISSIONER.—We understand that Mr. Tufnell, one of the Assistant Poor-law Commissioners, has resigned his office, from dissatisfaction at the conduct of the Commissioners.

WESTMINSTER ELECTION.—The Hon. Captain Rous will be opposed by General Evans, who sat for Westminster several years after the passing of the Reform Act, on Radical principles. At a meeting of the Westminster Reform Society on Wednesday night, a resolution was carried that General Evans should be requested to offer himself. The General, who was in waiting, was then called in, and he formally accepted the invitation. He said that if returned, and the League and the Whigs decided upon supporting Sir Robert Peel's propositions, he should go with them; but if the League insisted upon an immediate total repeal, he should act with it. We understand that the election will take place next week

THE WELLS IN TRAFALGAR-SQUARE.—On Wednesday workmen were occupied in laying down fresh pumps to the wells of six inches and a half larger calibre than the last, in consequence of the great additional supply required since the first were laid down. The quantity required for the ventilation alone of the new houses of Parliament, in cooling the air, and for other purposes, is about 200 gallons per minute. Notwithstanding the great additional supply required since the water from these wells has been conducted to the Government offices and barracks, it has risen to an additional height of five feet since they were first opened.

HOSPITAL FOR CONSUMPTION, &c., BROMPTON.—On Saturday evening last, a committee of gentlemen, including Colonel Le Blanc, Otho Hamilton, Esq., Dr. Forbes, Dr. Dickson, Dr. Roe, &c. &c., the Secretary, Architect, and other officers of the Institution, inspected the west wing, and principal entrance to the new Hospital, building at Brompton; when the greatest satisfaction was expressed at the progress of the works. The warming and ventilation are very rapidly advancing, and arrangements being made for the application of temperature of various degrees, so as to approximate that of different climates into particular apartments. When sufficient funds are available for its completion, the Charity will be second to none in the empire. Robert Baxter, Esq., has recently sent £100, and "a Receiver of Many Mercies," £50, in aid of the building fund.

MORTALITY OF THE METROPOLIS.—The deaths registered in the Metropolis during the week ending the 7th instant amounted to 914. Births, 1544.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

FRIGHTFUL MURDER AND SUICIDE.

Between six and seven o'clock on Thursday morning, the inhabitants of Arbour-square, Commercial-road, were alarmed by loud calls for the police, and screams of murder issuing from the house No 16, in the square, occupied by a respectable man, named Baxter, employed as a clerk in Templeman's coal wharf. Police constable Sutherland, who was passing the house, which is within 80 or 100 yards of the Thames Police Court and station-house, immediately entered, and on descending to the back kitchen received in his arms the body of a young woman in the last gasp of death from a frightful wound in the right side of the throat, which gaped to the extent of several inches. She died almost immediately, without uttering a word. Having laid the body on the floor, he proceeded to the next apartment, which was furnished in the way of a parlour, and there, on the floor, close to the fire-place, lay the body of a man about twenty-six years of age, with his head nearly severed from his body, his throat being cut quite across. A pool of blood had issued from the wound, and where the woman lay in the other apartment the place was also deluged with blood. There was blood at the foot of the stairs, and the door, the table, and the chairs were scattered and smeared with it. The fender, fire-irons, and furniture were scattered about in every direction, and all things betokened a silent but terrible struggle.

And the motive that could be collected in the confusion which ensued, thus appears to be one of those motiveless murders which, had the suicide survived, would, by some sapient Jury, have been attributed to insanity. It seems the deceased young woman had not yet attained her sixteenth year, was the daughter of Mr. Baxter, the proprietor of the house, against whose consent she married her murderer, Jeremiah Spence Stark, about nine months since. Though averse to the wedding to the back kitchens received in his arms the body of a young woman in the last gasp of death from a frightful wound in the right side of the throat, which gaped to the extent of several inches. She died almost immediately, without uttering a word. Having laid the body on the floor, he proceeded to the next apartment, which was furnished in the way of a parlour, and there, on the floor, close to the fire-place, lay the body of a man about twenty-six years of age, with his head nearly severed from his body, his throat being cut quite across. A pool of blood had issued from the wound, and where the woman lay in the other apartment the place was also deluged with blood. There was blood at the foot of the stairs, and the door, the table, and the chairs were scattered and smeared with it. The fender, fire-irons, and furniture were scattered about in every direction, and all things betokened a silent but terrible struggle.

And the motive that could be collected in the confusion which ensued, thus appears to be one of those motiveless murders which, had the suicide survived, would, by some sapient Jury, have been attributed to insanity. It seems the deceased young woman had not yet attained her sixteenth year, was the daughter of Mr. Baxter, the proprietor of the house, against whose consent she married her murderer, Jeremiah Spence Stark, about nine months since. Though averse to the wedding to the match, the parents were induced to do it by the belief that it might further their future prospects; but the son-in-law was of gloomy and morose temper, and apparently idly disposed. The only discoverable grounds for the terrible tragedy which has so alarmed the neighbourhood, are these:—

A little brother of the young woman slept in the same apartment with her and her husband, and on the previous night heard the latter abusing her and calling her by opprobrious names. This he communicated to his father, who subsequently remonstrated with Stark on the impropriety of his conduct. It would seem this galled the fellow, and must have rankled all night in his mind. From the appearance of the front kitchen, which seemed to be the favourite room of the family, the young woman must have been at work, cleaning up the place, when Stark made the fell attack upon her, and the silent struggle between them must have been terrible. Her hands were cut in several places through the gloves which she wore while doing her work.

The poor young woman is said to have been a very good-tempered girl, of very prepossessing appearance; and her life might have been saved, had she had the presence of mind to call out in the confusion which ensued, that the murderer prevented her giving timely alarm, as there were several persons in the house at the time. In the blood, close to the head of the murdered, there was a comb belonging to the young woman, which must have dropped from her hair in the commencement of the struggle. The only object which has been removed is the weapon with which the horrid deed has been committed, and that lies wrapped in a newspaper at the Arbour-square station-house. It is a black-handled carving-knife, covered from the point to the hilt with thick, clotted gore

An inquest was held on Thursday afternoon, and the Jury returned a verdict that "The deceased, Jeremiah Spence Stark, killed his wife while labouring under insanity, and that he afterwards inflicted a wound upon himself while in the same state, of which he instantly died."

SHIPWRECK NEAR LIVERPOOL, AND LOSS OF THIRTEEN LIVES.—A very melancholy shipwreck took place on Saturday last off Liverpool. The Bencombe, Captain Charabent, belonging to Mr. Ripley, of that town, left Callao, with a cargo of guano, cotton, and hides, for Liverpool, on the 13th of November. Her crew consisted of twenty-one hands. All went on favourably during the voyage, and on Saturday, about seven o'clock, she passed Holyhead, and in an hour afterwards she was boarded by a pilot. The wind at the time was favourable for making port, but owing to some cause, at present unaccountable, the vessel struck on "Taylor's Bank" about seven o'clock in the evening; and in about twenty minutes was a complete wreck. At the time the vessel struck the boats were lowered, but two of them were swamped by the heavy sea that was running. Into the third eight of the crew succeeded in getting, when the rope which held it to the vessel broke, and the wind and tide drove her from the ship, thereby cutting off all chance of saving any more. This boat immediately made off for Liverpool, which she reached about half past nine o'clock at night. The remainder of the crew, thirteen in number, including the pilot, have, we regret to say, met a watery grave. The following are the names of those who are drowned:—Sands, chief mate; the captain; Creasey, second mate; William Adamson, seaman; Robert Wallace, seaman; George Spencer and M'Neill, seamen; Charles Pugh, seaman; the carpenter, sailmaker, and pilot, and one seaman and boy, names unknown. Those saved are as follows: William Meadows, James Johnson, James Bezer, Jackson, a boy; Sparrow, a boy; George Grey, seaman; the steward and cook.

DEATH UNDER SUSPICIOUS CIRCUMSTANCES.—Last week we gave a report of the examination of a man named Munton, who was charged at Lambeth office with cutting his wife's throat. Mrs. Susan Vesey, an aged woman, the mother-in-law of the prisoner, who indeed was a principal witness against him, on Friday (last week) complained of illness, and died on the same evening. An inquest was held on Monday at the Giraffe Tavern, Penn-place, Newington, to inquire into the circumstances of her death. The first witness called was Richard Vesey, the son of the deceased, who deposed that his mother had, for some time past, complained of illness and spasms, and that owing to the excitement caused by her daughter's throat being cut, and her son-in-law being in custody on a charge of having inflicted the wound, she became much worse. On Friday morning she complained of being seriously ill, and wished to see Mr. Young, a medical gentleman, and witness accompanied her to that gentleman's shop. Mr. Young gave her some medicine, a part of which she then took, and soon after she said she was better; but while she was returning home she fell down in the street. Witness assisted her home, and she went to bed with her clothes on. He left her about two o'clock, when she said she was better; but on his return at eight o'clock in the evening, he found her dead. Mr. Stevens, a medical gentleman, who had made a post mortem examination of the body, attributed the death of the deceased solely to the diseased state of the heart. The Jury returned a verdict of "Death by natural causes."

A RHAPSODY FOR THE FOURTEENTH OF FEBRUARY.

To-day it is St. Valentine's Day.
SHAKESPEARE.—Hamlet.

I've not, I confess it, the least information
Who St. Valentine was, what his nurture, or nation;
But if you'd find out,
You had best look about
Through all orders of Saints, and I haven't a doubt,
Though your search should be strict in
The rule Benedictine,
And the Convents whose walls Monks too lively were bricked in,
I think one may swear
That you'd not find him there,
Nor 'mongst Carmelites glum, in cowlless of hair;
Nor, (I'd give the odds, slap)—
'Mongst the Monks of La Trappe:
No—St. Val. was another guess sort of a chap,
And—(I'm safe in the assertion)—
Scorned all such coercion
For some Order that loved "the least taste of diversion."
The matins they sung at day-break there,
Were waking-songs to ladies fair;
And their nocturns were passionate serenades
Under the windows of white-armed maids;
And their de profundis were deep-drawn sighs,
That pale Love's cheek, but fire Love's eyes,
And the worship they gave was a bended knee
To many a virgin besides Marie,
And their incense the mingled fragrance sweet
From lips that in kisses part and meet——
But my muse is off—stop her!
This style she must drop, or
Folks will say that her language is highly improper.
But if Valentine wasn't the sort of a person
That is given to love and his love-tricks make verse on,
How comes it about
(For the fact's beyond doubt)
That his day is Dan Cupid's peculiar "day out?"
When Love's herald rides post,
And of hearts rules the roast,
With his bag in spontaneous combustion almost;
And—a sly little shaver—
Though the general enslaver,
By "the general delivery" distributes his favour.
Oh! bless'd day of blisses,
That crownest with kisses
The attic of maid and the boudoir of misus.

Death has the credit, with divine and poet,
Of levelling distinctions, and they show it
By sapient saws, how his fell sceptre sweeps down
The beggar's rights with the kingly crown.
But there's a leveller as strong as Death,
That warms all life as he doth chill all breath,
That in the all-pervading air doth move,
Unheard, unseen, but ever-acting, Love!
Thanks to the power that framed us so,
No heart so cold but feels his glow;
No lot so beggarly or sad,
But Love, like light, may make it glad.
And the day of all days for his kindly sway,
Is the one we are honouring, St. Valentine's Day!
When the startling rat-tat
Sets hearts pit-a-pat;
And makes maids who're romantic, "most drop on the mat."
From Dolly and Sairey,
And Martha and Mary,
Who, like mushrooms, grow fat in the damp of the area,
To young ladies up stairs,
Who give themselves airs,
And think Valentines low, till the postman leaves theirs;
Then, good bye to scouring,
And basting, and flouring,
While each pair of eyes a sweet sheet is devouring;
And the motive that could be collected in the confusion which ensued, thus appears to be one of those motiveless murders which, had the suicide survived, would, by some sapient Jury, have been attributed to insanity. It seems the deceased young woman had not yet attained her sixteenth year, was the daughter of Mr. Baxter, the proprietor of the house, against whose consent she married her murderer, Jeremiah Spence Stark, about nine months since. I think one may swear
That you'd not find him there,
Nor 'mongst Carmelites glum, in cowlless of hair;
Nor, (I'd give the odds, slap)—
'Mongst the Monks of La Trappe:
No—St. Val. was another guess sort of a chap,
And—(I'm safe in the assertion)—
Scorned all such coercion
For some Order that loved "the least taste of diversion."
The matins they sung at day-break there,
Were waking-songs to ladies fair;
And their nocturns were passionate serenades
Under the windows of white-armed maids;
And their de profundis were deep-drawn sighs,
That pale Love's cheek, but fire Love's eyes,
And the worship they gave was a bended knee
To many a virgin besides Marie,
And their incense the mingled fragrance sweet
From lips that in kisses part and meet——
But my muse is off—stop her!
This style she must drop, or
Folks will say that her language is highly improper.
But if Valentine wasn't the sort of a person
That is given to love and his love-tricks make verse on,
How comes it about
(For the fact's beyond doubt)
That his day is Dan Cupid's peculiar "day out?"
When Love's herald rides post,
And of hearts rules the roast,
With his bag in spontaneous combustion almost;
And—a sly little shaver—
Though the general enslaver,
By "the general delivery" distributes his favour.
Oh! bless'd day of blisses,
That crownest with kisses
The attic of maid and the boudoir of misus.

Death has the credit, with divine and poet,
Of levelling distinctions, and they show it
By sapient saws, how his fell sceptre sweeps down
The beggar's rights with the kingly crown.
But there's a leveller as strong as Death,
That warms all life as he doth chill all breath,
That in the all-pervading air doth move,
Unheard, unseen, but ever-acting, Love!
Thanks to the power that framed us so,
No heart so cold but feels his glow;
No lot so beggarly or sad,
But Love, like light, may make it glad.
And the day of all days for his kindly sway,
Is the one we are honouring, St. Valentine's Day!
When the startling rat-tat
Sets hearts pit-a-pat;
And makes maids who're romantic, "most drop on the mat."
From Dolly and Sairey,
And Martha and Mary,
Who, like mushrooms, grow fat in the damp of the area,
To young ladies up stairs,
Who give themselves airs,
And think Valentines low, till the postman leaves theirs;
Then, good bye to scouring,
And basting, and flouring,
While each pair of eyes a sweet sheet is devouring;
As with rapture they learn,
Of some score of young men's hearts all done to a turn.
Then a glory shines upon
Damp, dark kitchen paved with stone;
And the spot that rules the hours
Strews the area steps with flowers.
The baker, mealy-faced and stupid,
Is glorified into a Cupid;
And the loaves his baskets bear,
Are those that make up Bach'lors fare,
Sweetened with kisses—and the feet
Of eager passers in the street,
Seem winged with love—and butchers' boys
Are ominous of future joys;
And in each tray, with skewer for dart,
The symbo. of "the bleeding heart."
Now love always a mummer,
Plays freaks even runner
Than usual, and puts on the garb of each comer,
Now in coat of police
He's breaking our peace
And bidding us "move on" or "love and increase."
Now in leathers and boots
He beats up for recruits
In a Life Guardsman's uniform—loveliest of suits—
Then frantic, rushes
Into Mr. John's plushes
And drowns, with his antics, the kitchen in blushes;
Nor less rife, I presume,
In the front drawing-room,
Where Miss Emily's trying her best to assume
A due air of gravity,
As with traitorous suavity,
Love whispers that hardness of heart is depravity,
Which sin she may best shun
If, when —— pops the question,
She wont with a "no" spoil the poor man's digestion.
In short upon glorious St. Valentine's day,
Despite what stiff mothers and stern pa's may say,
And tho' frosty-faced Misses drive "followers" away,
Down areas, thro' key-holes, Love still will make play,
Still rear an bright banner, and his be the sway,
With three cheers for St. Valentine—Hip—Hip—Hurrah!

ST. VALENTINE'S DAY.—DRAWN BY KENNY MEADOWS.—(See preceding page.)

FINE ARTS.—OPENING OF THE BRITISH INSTITUTION.

FRUIT.—PAINTED BY LANCE

THE BRITISH INSTITUTION.

We will not inquire into the real motives of the secession of our great artists from the walls of this Institution, farther than incidentally to state our opinion that their gradually decreasing contributions to such an essentially national Exhibition is a matter of deep regret. It has the pernicious effect of not presenting to our young artists objects of comparison; for nothing less than the salutary fear of being contrasted with the superior works of reputed masters, could save the artists themselves from that deplorable facility so easily mistaken for indications of talent, producing in this instance an amazing display of canvass, in which it is difficult to trace a single sparkle of artistical mind.

We consider ourselves bound to make these somewhat severe remarks, dictated not only by the interest we take in Art itself, but by the respect we entertain for artists themselves. It has been observed, that critics generally mention too many works; that general considerations upon art want a greater development, and that in order to lay down principles, and make applications of them, it would be sufficient to select amongst the exhibited pictures only a few of transcendant merit.

We should like, certainly, to be able to work out this method, and we wish, too, for our own sake, as well as that of the public, that a single work could be found in each Exhibition of such genius as to command universal admiration, and serve as if it were a point d' appui to all our remarks on other works. Unfortunately, the day is not yet come to make such a selection; and we have now only works of a relative superiority, and none of absolute pre-eminence.

Perhaps we should apologise for this apparent digression, and beg leave to proceed to our review; walking at random through the rooms, and stopping without any regard to the order in which the pictures are placed in the catalogue.

We had scarcely reached the last step of the staircase, when we were struck by the very gem of the Exhibition—the "Poppy of Andalusia," Inskipp (180). This charming production, so remarkable for its elegant simplicity and breadth of execution, is only to be equalled, if not surpassed, by another work of the same artist, which is so characteristic as not to require reference to the catalogue to indicate the "Spanish Peasant Girl" (66). The first picture will certainly find more favour with the mass of the public, as being more catching and coquetish the magnificence and taste of the head-dress alone must secure for it the preference of the ladies. But, for completeness as a work of art, we should prefer the "Peasant Girl;" the brilliancy and deepness of tone in which is really worthy of the old Spanish masters, of whom Inskipp must have been recently inspired. The accessories are masterly and exquisite. The expression is not so seductant in the "Poppy;" but it possesses more character. Painted from nature, as undoubtedly it is, we do not hesitate to say, fresh in our recollection as are his works, a Velasquez himself could have signed this picture.

We received such a pleasurable impression of its merit that we could not resist the temptation of looking first for the other contributions of the same artist, who, this year, has been very liberal to the Institution; and has made ample compensation for the absence of other eminent masters; thus we had no fewer than seven of Inskipp's productions

"The Sunset" (368), a splendid landscape, with two charming peasant-girls in the foreground, treated with the same freedom and boldness of style.

"A Venetian" (235), although painted with a wonderful degree of power and reality, is not so pleasing as "The Locket" (433), a delightful portrait of another young girl, holding a locket in her hand.

"Sunday Evening" (68), a girl, who has fallen asleep in reading a book, that lies on her knees, seems to us inferior to the preceding pictures.

19. "A Scene in the Swiss Alps after a Storm," by Diday, the celebrated Genevese painter. This painter, whose works have already been exhibited in this country, is the chief and founder of a new school of landscape—the only one that does justice to the wild grandeur of Alpine scenery. The present specimen is in the best style of this master, and reminds us of the compositions of Salvator Rosa. Unfortunately, the picture has been a little damaged in the voyage. Public taste is generally so much biassed by the prettiness and coquetish effects of the herd of landscape painters, that we really fear this magnificent composition will not meet with the degree of admiration it deserves; but we recommend it to artists as one of the finest studies of Nature in her most solemn grandeur

We cannot help mentioning that Diday is the master of the celebrated Calame, whose works, admirably lithographed, have met with such success in this country among our artists

46. "The Tempest of Shakspeare, from Miranda's description," F. Danby, A.R.A. Although we do not want to establish a parallel between this composition and the preceding one, yet we think they ought to be mentioned together; not only as of the same superior order, but as both presenting remarkable instances of the power of a poetical mind, joined to the mastery of material execution. We will not attempt to describe the picture better than by referring to the lines quoted in the catalogue:—

> "The sky, it seems, would pour down stinking pitch,
> But that the sea, mounting to the welkin's cheek,
> Dashes the fire out—O! I have suffered
> With those that I saw suffer! A brave vessel
> Dash'd all to pieces. O! the cry did knock
> Against my very heart.

A more poetical illustration of which could not be conceived. We have, by the same artist, another interesting subject, of less dimensions, but not of inferior merit—457, "The Cave of the Excommunicated," a moonlight scene of a thrilling effect.

134. "The Britanny Conscript Leaving Home," by F. Goodall, is a picture of evidently much pretension, and which the Institution seems to have relied upon for a great hit. But, with all the interest that we take in the productions of this very promising artist, we must confess that we have been rather disappointed in the present instance. His new picture, although not destitute of a certain relative merit, as great facility of execution, is too defective in point of composition, and too little impressed with the pathetic qualities such a subject affords and requires. We claim a right to be particular, from the artist's very deserved success of his "Marriage Fête in Britanny," two years since, which imposes upon him great obligations. We must add, in justice, that another little picture of his (93), "Fairy Scruck," of more modest size, is in his best style, and quite worthy of his former efforts

4, 41, and 47. Three well-painted Interior Scenes, by a brother of the above artist, seem to indicate the family to be rich in talent.

144. "The Death of Cardinal Beaufort," J. Gilbert. However difficult or delicate be the subject to grapple with, we shall, perhaps, never find an artist who will handle it with more freedom and facility than the very clever painter of this picture. We may differ sometimes with him as to the choice of the subject itself, or the more or less poetical interpretation of it, but you may always reckon upon a gorgeous display of the richest colours, delicious and artistical groupings—in short, upon all the resources of a prodigious boldness of execution. In the present instance, we question the propriety of giving so brilliant an atmosphere to a scene of such portentious horror. It seems to us that a little more of repose and sobriety of light would have been more in harmony with the awfulness of the scene. For instance, how much more impressive would be the effect of the horror-stricken figure of the Cardinal pointing, in his delirium, to the shadowed profile on the wall, had it not been as if it were immersed in a blaze of gold and light, which gives to the whole an appearance of gaudiness. But, in spite of these defects, this picture—so remarkable for its breadth and brilliancy is highly commendable as an historical composition; and the best attempt of the kind in this exhibition. We should not pass unnoticed a very nicely painted Head, by the same artist, which he calls "John Bunyan, writing his 'Pilgrim's Progress' in Prison."

Mr. C. Lance, the king of still-life painting, has contributed six of his astonishing productions, one of which (147) we have engraved. It is difficult for those who have not had the good luck to see the above pictures, to imagine the wonderful illusion they produce. There is no overrating their merit in saying they are the most complete and perfect specimens of a branch of art which requires more power of composition than is generally understood. We sincerely congratulate him upon his abstaining from the introduction of living figures.

ANOTHER NEW COMET.—A letter from Professor Schumacher, of Altona, to Sir J. South, announces the discovery of a comet in Eridanus. The letter, which is dated Altona, Feb. 6, says: "So near to post time that I cannot print a circular to-day, comes a letter from Father Di Vico, informing me that he has discovered a comet on the 24th of January last. Its position was—at 10 hours 38 minutes 17 seconds and 8-10ths (mean time at Rome), right ascension, 4 hours 6 minutes 59 seconds and 2-10ths; south declination, 7 degrees 11 minutes 30 seconds and 6-10ths. He gives the hourly motion, 1.434 seconds (in time) to the east, and 2 minutes and 56 seconds to the north."

CORN-LAW PETITIONS. It appears from the official list of petitions on the subject of the Corn-laws, that the number presented up to Monday last was, for the Corn-laws, 151, with 10,982 signatures, averaging not quite 84 each; against the Corn-laws, 39 petitions, with 80,793 signatures; an average of 2308 each.

BAPTISM OF THE CROWN PRINCE OF HANOVER.—On the 4th inst., the ceremony of the baptism of the hereditary Prince of Hanover was performed by Dr. Leopold, the first chaplain to his Majesty There were present, the Royal household, the English Minister, Mr. Bligh; the members of the Cabinet, the Ministers; and the ceremony took place in an apartment in the Royal Palace, according to the rite of the national church (the Lutheran). The young Prince was baptised by the name of Ernest Augustus William Adolphus George Frederick. The sponsors are the King of Prussia, the Duke of Cambridge, the Duchess of Gloucester, the Princess Sophia of England, the Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg Strelitz, the Duchess Louisa of Wurtemburg, and the Duke and Duchess of Saxe Altenburg The whole ceremony lasted scarcely three-quarters of an hour. The King appeared immediately afterwards at the open window, where the young Prince was shown to the crowd, which greeted him with long continued cheers.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE DEPARTURE OF THE COURT FOR CLAREMONT.

Arrangements have been made for her Majesty and the Prince Consort, accompanied by the Royal Family, to leave Buckingham Palace for Claremont, to-day. The Court will not remain beyond Tuesday next; the following day (the 18th) having been appointed for her Majesty's Leven to be held at St. James's Palace.

Within a day or two after the Drawing-room to be held on Thursday, the 26th inst., the Court will take its departure for Osborne House, and be absent from town for about ten days or a fortnight. The infant Royal Family will accompany her Majesty and the Prince Consort to the Isle of Wight.

The Court is expected to arrive at Windsor about the middle of the ensuing month.

ANNIVERSARY OF HER MAJESTY'S MARRIAGE.—On Tuesday, the sixth anniversary of her Majesty's marriage, a large party had the honour of being invited to dine at Buckingham Palace, in celebration of the event.

HER MAJESTY'S FIRST LEVEE FOR THE SEASON.—Her Majesty held her first Levee for the present season, at St. James's Palace, on Wednesday. Shortly before two o'clock, the Queen and Prince Albert, attended by the Great Officers of the Household, and escorted by a detachment of the Life Guards, left Buckingham Palace in three of the Royal carriages, and proceeded to St. James's. Her Majesty and her illustrious Consort were loudly cheered by the assembled thousands who had congregated in the Park to witness the brilliant spectacle. The carriages of the Foreign Ambassadors and Ministers, and those having the privilege of the entrée, arrived in rapid succession shortly after one o'clock. The Levee was most numerously and brilliantly attended. After the Levee, the Duke of Richmond had an audience of her Majesty, and presented addresses. The Queen and Prince Albert, attended by the Royal suite, returned to Buckingham Palace, escorted by a party of Life Guards. The American Minister is confined to his house by severe illness, and was consequently unable to attend her Majesty's Levee. His Excellency was represented by Mr. Gansevoort Melville, his Secretary at Legation.

ARISTOCRATIC MARRIAGE.—On the 30th ult. a marriage took place at Hesse-Cassel, between Colonel Lord Charles Bentinck and the eldest daughter of the reigning Count of Waldeck and Pyrmont.

COUNTRY NEWS.

ANOTHER EXTRAORDINARY MEETING OF LABOURERS IN WILTSHIRE

There was another remarkable meeting of labourers on Tuesday last in Wiltshire. It was held at the hamlet of Bremhill, between the Great Western Railway and the town of Calne. Abort 1500 persons were present, some of them women. We abridge the particulars of this meeting from a graphic and striking account of it in the Chronicle. On Tuesday night last (says the writer), a moonlit meeting of the "protected" hewers of wood and drawers of water in the agricultural county of Wilts was held at Bremhill, an unheard of hole, hamlet, lying between the Great Western Railway and the quiet rural town of Calne.

The character of the speeches was peculiar: they were simply statements—little or no argument was used. Each labourer and labourer's wife told the details of their domestic economy. There was little or no variation in the story. Families of from four to twelve persons—wages at an average of eight shillings a week for the father, eked out in some cases by the "twopences a day" received by his boys. As for food, all they had was potatoes, and, as one of the speakers strikingly phrased it, "stark naked bread." The proceedings went off very quiet y.

The proceedings commenced soon after seven, when there were, probably, about 1500 persons present—clustered in dense mass round a stone cottage and the canvas tent. A labourer, John Gingel, took the chair—that is to say, perched himself on one of the higher stone steps which supported the cross, thus forming a sort of apex to the pyramidal group which clustered round it. There by the flicker of a morsel of candle, held by himself, he proceeded to read the bill calling the meeting together. After reading the placard, he spoke some-hat as follows:—"My friends—I be a labouring man; I have a wife and seven children (hisses). My wages, at the present time, is 8s. a week (cries of "You can't live on that—you can't.") In the beginning of December last, I only got 7s. But, one week with another, I get 8s. That comes, I think, to £20 16s. a year. Allowing my wife to earn 9d. a week, which certain be more than she did for the last three or four year, and seeing that two of my sons earn 2s. a week, and one of them 3s. 6d., which, if I don't mistake, make, together, £9 9s. a year, you see we may get we earn, altogether, £31 7s. I say, friends, if you take the 365 days, that will only give 1½d. a day for us each to live on, all with the exception of is." (Shame, shame.)

Joan Batchelor, of Penny, a labourer, was the next speaker. For the last fortnight he had received only 6s. a week. He knew many men with four children who had only 6s. and 5s. (Shame.) He himself he did not know what he had expected to be discharged when he got home for having come to the meeting. (A voice: "Come to me, and I will give you 10s" Cheers.) There was only one labourer at Penny earning 8s. a week. (Shame.) It be them Corn-laws, those accursed Corn-laws, which made bread dear. He had been employed like a horse in drawing a cart. (Shame.) He was one of five men yoked to the cart That was the way Protection used them. Let them hold up their hands, then, for its destruction, root and branch. This was the resolution he proposed:—"Resolved, That this meeting is satisfied from experience that one general distress prevails among the labouring classes; that the Corn-laws have failed to give employment to the agricultural labourers, and in the opinion of this meeting, they ought forthwith to be repealed." (Loud cheers greeted the resolution.)

George Chivers, of Winterburn, seconded it. He did it because he had not bread enough to eat. ("There be many like you.") He had sometimes 6s., sometimes 7s a week.

The resolution was duly carried.

Charles Kingel, of Penny, parish of Hillmartin, seconded the next resolution. I am, he said, one of your protected labourers. I have seven children; the eldest is nineteen years of age, and he earns 8d a day. This is protection. (Cries of "Shame.") Well, he gives it to me, and I don't it day I pay all his keep.—I have to give him washing and lodging. I have a wife and six other children. I have a lad, ten years of age, working for twopence a day. I labour myself for 8s. I think I may be

THE THEATRES.

ASTLEY'S.

A new grand Oriental elephantine spectacle—we speak by the bill—was produced here on Monday evening, under the title of "The Rajah of Nagpore; or, the Sacred Elephants of the Pagoda," for the sake of introducing to a British audience two huge quadrupeds, lately imported, we believe, from Paris.

We enjoy an Eastern spectacle at Astley's, because it sets our Indian empire before us as we believe it to be—not as cold travellers would make us think it is. We have implicit reliance upon the Astley's authorities, either in matters of dress, manners, or scenery connected with Asiatic affairs in general; and we always read the Tribune or Marseilles overland mail as we would a play-bill. We have always conceived Calcutta to be a city entirely of platforms and terraces, whose inhabitants, without one exception, wear spangled dresses and foil helmets. We believe that magnificent processions, to which Blue Beard's was a mere depatation, throng the streets all day long; that the bang of drums and cymbals sounds perpetually; and that the Bayadères are such as we have seen at the play in the "Maid of Cashmere." These things have been impressed upon us ever since we first went to Astley's, at a time when we conceived the Clown to be always as we then and there saw him, even in his own house, if he indeed had one. Of this we had always doubts. We rather inclined to the belief that he was some species of supernatural part and parcel of the saw-dust, as a Dryad would be of the entire tree, and never went out of the arena. We do not wish to be undeceived with respect to these things. We rejoice—silently, but deeply—to find that stage illusion has still some little power over us, and we would not have the charm broken. For this, we love a visit to Astley's—now and then; like roast pig, we do not think we could stand it continuously; and, occasionally, it is a high treat. And when, as this week, we see that the piece will conclude with a "grand tableau, realising all the details of Oriental magnificence so delightfully idealised in the fabled histories of Hindostan"—that's the bill again—we will be bound that our anticipation is as much worked up as that of the most expectant gamin in the gallery, or ruddy-looking servant maid by the side of the soldier in the pit, into whose arms he sure that the Merryman will jump, when pursued by the pony. And when we read, in addition, that we are to see "The Elephants of Elora—the Brahminade God, Vishnuse—the Golden Forest of Palms, and the down-pouring torrent of the rapid Siva"—that's the bill again—our excitement is absolutely painful.

The elephants who perform on the occasion in question, are very clever: one is considerably larger than the other, and there is a difference in their accomplishments. Their performances are very similar to those of the elephant who was at the Adelphi some twelve or fourteen years ago; and the incidents worked into the piece, to introduce them, are nearly the same.

There is, of course, a lawful Prince, and an unlawful one; with plotting priests, designing nobles of Nagpore, and comic cobblers enough to fill up the interim when the great performers of the evening are not on the stage, to the intense interest and amusement of the gallery. And there are processions, banners, and all sorts of gorgeous paraphernalia; moreover, the elephants dine at the Rajah's table, dance with the Rajah's coryphées, and draw the Rajah's car; and the final triumph of virtue over the machinations of vice offers a gratifying dénouement to the well-regulated minds of the audience. For there is an elevated morale in the sentiments of the Astley habitués: and if the rightful heir—and there always is one—was to be finally wronged, no one might answer for the consequences.

The piece has been well put upon the stage, and will have a run. The tableaux are very effectively arranged. The individual playing the cornet-à-piston in the orchestra merits commendation for his clever performance of a solo, in the overture. The house was well filled, but not crowded.

DRURY-LANE.

On Thursday evening a new ballet was produced, called "The Island Nymph," invented by M. Barrey, of the Académie Royale, at Paris; with music composed by Signor Schira. We scarcely know whether it may justly come under the denomination of a "grand ballet," inasmuch as the incidents are somewhat trifling: indeed, it is rather a divertissement in two acts; but it is one of those agreeable connections in which affairs, human and semi-mythological, are very pleasantly mixed; and, partaking of the character of Telemachus," and other subjects of that class, does not allow the audience to think much upon its probabilities, whilst they are amused by its artistic conceptions. Mademoiselle Neadel, who made her first appearance on this occasion, promises to become a favourite; she is graceful and active, and was warmly applauded throughout. We shall be glad to see her in a subject of natural life, of the same caste as Esmeralda, Little Fido, La Grand, &c. Mons. Despiaces and Mdlle. Maria also experienced an enthusiastic greeting; and all three were called for at the conclusion of the ballet, and welcomed with renewed acclamations. The house was crowded. "Ion Quixote" preceded the new production, and the Pantomime concluded the programme of the evening's entertainments.

Mr. Sergeant Talfourd's tragedy of "Ion" was announced for representation at the HAYMARKET Theatre last evening. The part of Ion was to be sustained by Miss Cushman, and that of Clemantha by her sister. A full notice of the performance will appear in our next.

We are requested to contradict a report which appeared in the Observer of last week, to the effect that engagements had been formed with a new set of authors for the burlesques at the LYCEUM. The same gentlemen who have hitherto written for the theatre will continue to do so. It is expected that "The Cricket on the Hearth" will run some weeks longer. In the meantime, a three-act comedy, by the author of "Our New Governess," is in preparation, as well as a one-act extravaganza in verse, by Mr. Sonquier. A new burlesque for Easter is already in train. It is founded on Victor Hugo's romance of "Esmeralda," the part of the Bohemienne being intended for Mrs. Keeley. It will be written by Mr. Albert Smith; and the action will, of course, pass in Old Paris

THE NEW WEST-END THEATRE in Leicester-square, will soon be commenced, and full particulars will shortly be advertised. Meanwhile, the list of shareholders and patrons is daily increasing, and comprises the names of many of our leading nobility. The architect has completed his plans; and it is expected the Messrs Grisell and Peto will undertake the contract.

The French dog Emile, from whose performances at Astley's we gave a scene two or three weeks ago, has changed his quarters to the CITY THEATRE.

"Ireoline" has improved since its early representations at the ADELPHI. Some judicious condensations have been made: and now, altogether, it plays well and closely. The "Powder and Ball" extravaganza has been revived, but it was cruelly an unpropos piece, and the interest is now passé.

We are told that, in consequence of the success which attended Mr Selby's adaptation of the "Diable à Quatre," the Adelphi, has in a very handsome manner, over and above the terms agreed upon, which were in themselves liberal. It is gratifying to record this acknowledgment, by a manager, of the services rendered to his theatre by an author. As a sixth instance of what is very common, the bargain for brains being usually driven in as hard a manner as for spangles, canvass, or any other theatrical accessories.

Madame Albert plays for the last time this season at the ST. JAMES'S Theatre, on Wednesday evening, when "Marie" was the piece selected for her farewell. We have before spoken, more than once, of Madame Albert's admirable performance of the Savoyard Girl. Her first visit, Fanny, in the ball room scene, and finale but of dancing to the air, "La dot de cinq sons," was delicious. She was loudly called before the curtain at the conclusion of the piece, and made to curtsey her adieu amidst loud cheering and a storm of bouquets. M. Lafferière and Mdlle. St. Marc will be the chief attractions until the arrival o the next star

A new drama is to be produced at the SURREY on Monday, to be called "The Sea King's Vow," in which the services of "eighty female warriors" will be called into requisition

A new drama was announced for representation at SADLER'S WELLS last evening, entitled "Check to the King, or the Queen's First Move." We shall notice it next week

PROBLEM NO. 108.

From the MS. selection presented to the Editor by M. Andersen, of Breslau.

White to play first and give checkmate in three moves.

BLACK.

THE GREAT CHESS MATCH IN AMERICA.

TERMINATION OF THE CONTEST.

This exciting struggle for Chess supremacy in the New World was brought to a close on Saturday, December 27th, in favour of Mr. Stanley, the Englishman; the score at the conclusion of the match being—

STANLEY	15	ROUSSEAU..	8
Drawn	8

We had intended to give the whole of the games played, but understanding that they are about to be published in a separate volume, accompanied with illustrative notes by the combatants themselves, we shall content ourselves for the present with those which have already appeared in this journal.

6. K Kt to B 3rd	Q Kt to B 3rd	12. Kt to K 6th (ch)

Winning the Queen.

* This was thrown forward mainly as a lure to tempt the advance of White's Q's Pawn.

† White saw that he could now push on the Pawn advantageously, as, after the anticipated exchanges, his Kt would threaten to check at Q B 7th—a move which his opponent, in his eagerness to gain a Pawn, completely overlooked.

‡ These shallow devices may have succeeded very well against the competitors with whom Mr. Horwitz has heretofore contended, but they are sure to end in his discomfiture if attempted against so experienced a player as his present adversary.

§ Taking no heed of the impending check at his B 2nd.

¶ A best move, if sudden extinction is preferable to lingering torture. Had he moved elsewhere, the Kt would have taken Q Rook, and the game must have been lost eventually.

GAME THE FOURTH.

White resigns.

* It would, perhaps, have been prudent to return the Kt to Q B's 3d.

† The necessity to sustain the doubled Pawn gave White an opportunity of opening a powerful attack on the King's side

‡ Very well played.

§ A little examination will show that this was indispensable.

‖ White plays here with becoming care and foresight. He knew well the importance of getting his K's Rook to K's 3d, with the object of afterwards placing it behind the Q on the Rook's file, and he saw the difficulty of accomplishing it while Black's Bishop could be played to K B's 7th, a move effectually barred by the Q's Rook being stationed at k B's sq.

¶ This is an error. White forgot that on pushing forward his Kt's Pawn, as he meditated, Black could exchange Queens. His best move, we believe, was Rook to K R's 3d.

 Played with the conviction that White, overlooking the Q's Rook in reserve, would dash at a mate with his Kt.

†† This may be called "The game move." By bringing the banished Rook into operation at the proper moment, Black completely paralyses his opponent's attack ‡‡ Leaving White nothing but to retreat.

§§ He would obviously have lost his Queen had he taken the doubled Pawn with her.

‖‖ We have here one of those positions, where the young player, flushed with success, is so apt to suffer a victory, within his reach, to elude him. Nine out of ten Lesperienced amateurs would saw snatch at the Rook, conceiving the check with the knight a mere ass of time; and would be astounded to learn that they had lost the game by their impatuosity. Let us suppose Black to have played in the manner:—

	3.. B takes R	37. P to K Kt 7th (ch)	K must take P

16 Q to her B 2nd	B to his sq	33 P to K 7th
17 Q R to Q sq	Q Kt P one	and Black resigns.

* Since the time of Philidor, with whom this was a favourite defence, the leading writers of Italy, of Germany, and England, have concurred in pronouncing it inferior to Q Kt to B 3rd.

† With the hope of planting his Kt at Q 5th.

‡ Intending presently, if an opportunity occur, to play Q Kt to Q 5th, and, after the exchanges, take Q B P with his Q.

§ Had he played the Knight over to Q 5th, before protecting the Bishop, he would have lost at least a Pawn.

‖ The exchange of Pawns, with subsequent advance of this Pawn, appears, at first sight, a skilful conception, and one that must turn the scale in favour of the second player. Upon examination, however, it turns out to have been made without any consideration of the move White had iff store, which renders the whole combination worse than nugatory.

¶ This rejoinder was certainly not foreseen by Black when he played on the Q Pawn.

 He would have got an equally bad position by taking the K's P with P.

†† As the sacrifice of the Q's Kt at this crisis had many advocates when the game was over, it may be well to examine briefly the consequences of that move. Suppose, then, instead of K Kt's P one that Black had played

25. Q Kt takes Q P

White then has several ways of playing.

IN THE FIRST PLACE:

26. B takes K Kt	Q R takes B	28. P takes Kt	R takes B
27. K to R sq	Q R to K 2d (a)	29. Q P one
		Winning easily.

IN THE SECOND PLACE:

26 R takes Q Kt	B takes R	28. B takes Kt	R takes B
27. P takes B	Q takes P	29. B takes P
		And White ought to win.

IN THE THIRD PLACE:

26. P takes Q Kt	R takes B	29. K R to Q sq	R takes P
27. Q takes R	B to Q B 4th	30. Kt to K B 5th	B takes R
28. Q R to Q 4th	Kt to K B 3d	31. R takes B
		Retaining a piece more than Black.

(a) If he support the Q's R, White may at once take off the Kt.

A GOSSIP PARLIAMENTARY—SPEECHES, RESIGNATIONS, AND ELECTIONS.

Hitherto, the great Parliamentary case Protection v. Free-Trade has progressed languidly and stupidly enough

The great guns have reserved their fire till their enemies have exposed their whole column to a raking discharge. Independent of the old charge of treachery against the Premier, the Protectionists' speeches have rung the changes on the old themes. Mr. Sidney Herbert and Sir James Graham exhibit a strange fury of self condemnation, and confess, with apparent glee, to years of sins, misleglsation, and error, to be wiped away by their tardy acknowledgment of Free-Trade principles; and the Home Secretary, totidem verbis, in a single sentence sweeps away all he ever said on the other side of the question.

The manœuvre is a new one in Parliamentary tactics. A general impression seems to prevail that it is discreditable. It appears to us rather clumsy than wicked.

"Opinion in wise men," says Milton, "is wisdom in the making;" and so Sir Robert and his supporters, while supporting Protection for the last thirty years have really been making wisdom that was to enable them to throw it overboard in the thirty-first.

We venture on a Ministerial Palinode.
I once declared Protection the thing that saved the State.
I was wrong!
I once said £4 per quarter was for corn a proper rate.
An old song!
I once maintained the Leaguers would the country send to ruin.
'Twas a flam!
That dependence on the foreigner would work our own undoing.
All a bam!
I once believed in Richmond, in Chandos, and Newcastle.
I renounce 'em!
To the will of Dukes in general I bowed an humble vassal.
Now I trounce 'em!
I argued for validity of Pledges Parliamentary.
Now I break 'em!
It of the Constitution is a doctrine elementary
Not to take 'em!
In his motions for fixed duty, I voted against Russell.
Led by Mammon!
About notions revolutionary, I made an awful bustle.
'Twas all gammon!
Once I quoted thrice a week the old gag of "a bold peasantry."
Now I'm muzzled!
Once I held Free-Trade a Manchester and Sheffield bit of pleasantry.
Now I'm puzzled!
Once I blindly gave my nose to the fingers of my leader.
Still I do so!
Bowed to him who, with his loaves and fishes, was my feeder.
Wouldn't you so?

And the last couplet, we apprehend, contains the pith of the arguments that have produced this wonderful conversion in the underlings, at all events; of the Ministerial service. Among other curious Parliamentary signs of the times may be noticed the turnouts from the family boroughs. Woodstock went through its pleasant little election farce some months ago; the Chichester one came off on Tuesday last; and the Buckingham imitation on Wednesday. We subjoin the song of the nominee and the song of the nominee.

TO AN INTRACTABLE NOMINEE.

AIR.—"Genie Zutelle."

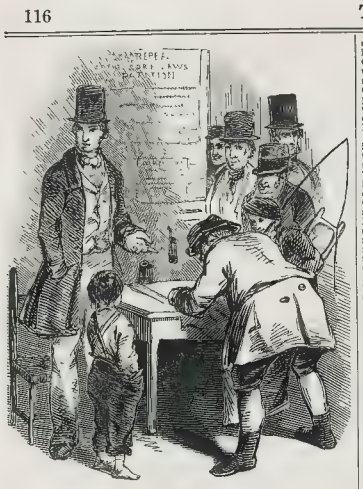
Impudent fellow! Up and away!
When did I tell you to vote in this way?
No—I'll have no man to take his own road,
When to my borough his seat he has owed.
Impudent fellow—he who'd stay here
His voice must sell oh! and sell as I steer.

Impudent fellow, what need you care,
Tho' on bad 'taters Ireland should fare?
When in the House, if a reason I see,
You must vote black, Sir, is white, after me.
Impudent fellow! it is quite clear,
You're not the member that I want here.

Impudent fellow! you don't seem aware
You're but my mouthpiece, to play but one air.
Talk of your conscience! you've no such thing;
You are the Subject, and I am the King!
Impudent fellow! leave the seat clear,
Take yourself off, for you're not wanted here.

And so the obedient nominee, thus potently conjured, writes a humble letter of reignation, bids farewell to the electors, and lays the flattering unction to his soul that he has lost his seat but saved his honour. Does he so? His song breathes, of course, a heroic resignation in every line of it—except the last.

One struggle more! and I am free
From votes, which I can ne'er explain—
One line to my Constituency,
Then back to private life again!
I know, too well, I must do now
A thing I never did before—



ANTI-CORN-LAW PETITION STREET SIGNATURES.

A thing my station quite below—
Work—now I am M.P. no more.

Then bring me pen, and paper bring:
He'll find that I can stand alone!
I'll do the independent thing—
Coquet with all, but vote with none.
It was not thus this time last year;
It never would have been, but thou
Hast kicked me out, and left me here.
Save honour, I have nothing now.

In vain defiance I would breathe—
A Conscience I should like to wear—
But that's no go with means beneath
Five hundred pounds, at least, a year.
Can conscience stave off writs, a shoal?
Can conscience pay my tailor's bill?
I think I'll vote, upon the whole.
Black White—and rest a member still.

In which unheroic mood we leave the repentant nominee for the present.

A few words upon the Free Trade Petitions to which thousands of signatures have been obtained in the al fresco style illustrated by our artist. The corner of a street is a favourite site for this open avowal of a public grievance: a table, such as the thimble-rig men once used, is set up instanter; one signing petitioner makes many; and the signs-manual, dumbless, present some curious specimens of calligraphy. Thus have been gathered many of the thousands of signatures appended to the petitions presented to Parliament during the past week: of the 14,600 from Southwark; 72,000 from Lambeth; 64,000 from the City; 83,000 from Finsbury, &c. Time presses: so, thanks to the itinerant supporters of the Premier's Plan.

THE ACCOUNTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE.

This handsome building, adjoining Lincoln's Inn, on the west side of Chancery-lane, has of late been the scene of considerable attraction, from its being the receptacle of the millions of money, as Railway deposits, required to be lodged with the Accountant-General. The business of the establishment is, altogether, of a complicated nature, as the following details will show:—

The Office of the Accountant-General of the Court of Chancery was established by order of the 26th of May, 1725, and 12 Geo. I., c. 32, before which time the effects of the suitors were locked up in the vaults of the Bank of England, under the care of the Masters and two of the Six Clerks.

The Accountant-General does not receive any of the monies or effects of the suitors of the Court; but they are placed in the Bank of England in his name; and he keeps an account with the Bank, according to the several causes and accounts to which such money and effects severally belong.

The dividends and interest of the several Stocks, India Bonds, and other Securities, are received by the Bank as they become due, under a power of attorney from the Accountant-General, and placed to the credit of the causes and accounts to which they belong. The Bank sends quarterly to the Accountant-General's Office a book called the Dividend Book, signed by an officer of the Bank; which book, containing the amount of the securities and interest money belonging to each cause and account, is countersigned by the Accountant-General, and sent into the Report Office. For each sum to be received by the Bank, the Accountant-General signs a Certificate, mentioning the Order, Report, or Act of Parliament, under the authority of which the person named in the certificate is to pay the sums therein specified, and directing it to be placed to his account as Accountant-General to the credit of the particular cause or account mentioned. When the party paying in the money, or his solicitor, brings into the Accountant-General's Office a certificate from the Bank of such payment having been made, the Accountant-General signs another certificate of such payment, and annexes it to the Bank certificate for the purpose of being entered in the Report Office.

For each sum of Stock directed by any order of the Court to be transferred into the name of the Accountant-General, application is made to the first clerk in the Office for a ticket specifying the amount of the Stock to be transferred, and the cause or account to which it is to be placed when such transfer is made. The Accountant-General accepts the Stock, and signs a certificate to the Bank of his having done so. Of this transfer, there is a certificate sent from the Bank, or from such office where the particular Stock may be, to the Accountant-General's Office, who signs another certificate of such transfer and his acceptance, and annexes it to the former certificate, for the purpose of being entered at the Report Office. For Exchequer Bills, or India Bonds, and each package containing specific articles directed by Order of Court to be deposited in the Bank in the name of this officer, he signs a direction for the person named in such Order to make such deposit in the Bank in his name, and to which cause or account it is to be placed. When the party, or his solicitor, brings into the Accountant-General's Office, a certificate from the Bank that such deposit has been made, the Accountant-General signs another certificate that such deposit has been made in the Bank, and annexes it to the Bank certificate, for the purpose of being entered at the Report Office.

For each sum directed to be paid out under any order, the Accountant-General draws on the Bank by a note under his hand, entitled in the particular cause or account out of which the money is to be paid; this note is entered at the Report Office, and marked and countersigned by one of the Registrars of the Court. If the money for which such note is drawn, be not for interest or maintenance, the Accountant-General signs a certificate of such note, which certificate is filed in the Report Office. For each sum of money directed to be laid out in the purchased Stock, Exchequer Bills, or India Bonds, the Accountant-General draws upon the Bank in the particular causes or account by note under his hand for the amount of such sum. The note is entered at the Report Office, and marked and countersigned by one of the Deputy Registrars of the Court. If the money be principal money, the Accountant-General signs a certificate of such note, which is filed in the Report Office.

If the purchase should be Stock, the Accountant-General accepts it by signing his name in the Transfer Book at the Bank, or where such Stock may be, he then signs a certificate to the Bank of his acceptance of such Stock in such particular cause or account. The Bank also sends to the Accountant-General's office a certificate that the transfer has been made—the Accountant-General signs another certificate of the particulars of such purchase, transfer, and acceptance, and annexes it to the Bank certificate, which is entered at the Report Office. If the purchase be Exchequer Bills or India Bonds, the Bank sends a certificate of same having been purchased and deposited in the particular cause or account mentioned in the note, the Accountant-General signs another certificate of the particulars, and annexes it to the Bank certificate, which is filed as before.

When any sum of Stock is, by any order, directed to be transferred, or directed to be sold; or when Exchequer Bills, India Bonds, or specific articles in packages are directed to be delivered out; the party or his solicitor brings a certificate from one of the Registrars of the Court, of what Stock is to be transferred, and to whom: of the Stock, Bills, or Bonds, to be sold, and to what amount; of the Bills, Bonds, or specific things to be delivered out, and to whom, and for what cause or account. In transfers of Stock, he signs, and sends to the Bank a certificate of his having made such transfer, and of the cause or account from which the same is made; he then signs another certificate of such transfer to be filed as before.

In sales of Stock, he signs a certificate to the Bank of the Stock sold and the money raised in the particular cause or account. On sale of Exchequer Bills or India Bonds, the Registrar's certificate is countersigned by the Accountant-General, who, having received from the Bank a certificate of the particulars, signs another certificate of such particulars, and annexes it to the Bank certificate, which is filed as before. When Exchequer Bills are delivered out, the Registrar's certificate is countersigned by the Accountant-General, and sent to the Bank, and the Bank having sent to him a certificate of the particulars of such Bills and things delivered out, to whom, and from what cause or account, the Accountant-General signs another certificate of such delivery, and annexes it to the Bank certificate to be filed at the Report Office as before.

When Exchequer Bills are to be paid off or exchanged, the party, or his solicitor, leaves the order at the office with directions; the Accountant-General signs a direction to the Bank for the principal money and interest due on the Bills, to be received and paid into the Bank in his name, or that they may be exchanged (as it may be). The Bank then gives a certificate that his directions have been complied with; the Accountant-General then signs another certificate, that the Bills have been exchanged, and principal and interest have been received, which with the Bank certificate, are filed as before. When cash or stock is directed to be carried over from one cause or account to another, he signs a certificate of instructions to the Bank. The Bank then sends a certificate of the same having been done; the Accountant-General then signs another certificate of such carrying over, and both certificates are filed as before.

AS TO PAYING MONEY INTO COURT

The party, or solicitor, desirous of paying money into Court, leaves the order with the clerk of the Accountant-General, who prepares a direction to the proper. This direction is obtained in two days after it is bespoke, and the solicitor then attends the Bank with the same, and the amount, in gold or notes. The party takes his notes to the cashier up-stairs, who tears off the signature to the notes, and he pays in his cash at the Teller's Office, for which he receives a written acknowledgment. He takes this and the mutilated notes and the Accountant-General's direction to the Chancery Office in the Bank, where he procures a receipt, which he takes to the cashier to be signed. The receipt is then filed, which is done by being left at the Accountant-General's Office.

AS TO SALE OF STOCK.

The Solicitor first leaves the order with the Registrar's Clerk, to prepare directions to the Accountant-General to sell; he then attends the Accountant with the order and directions, who attends twice a week at the Bank. After the Accountant-General has sold the Stock, the Solicitor has to attend for the Accountant-General's note or cheque upon the Bank for the amount, which, after being entered at the Report Office, and signed by a Registrar of the Court, is payable to the party in whose favour it has been drawn, or to his order; and must be passed through the Bank within one month after the date of it. From the time of bespeaking directions to obtaining the note or cheque for payment, usually occupies five or six days.

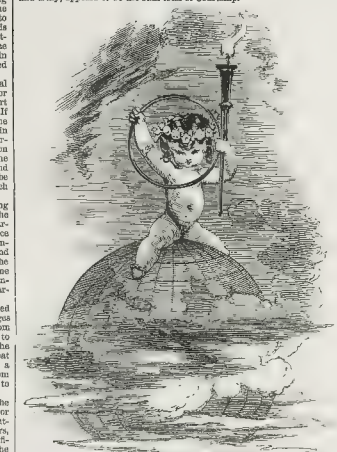
A PAPER FOR ST. VALENTINE'S DAY.

By W. B. JERROLD.

THE WAYS OF COURTING.

"Alas! and is domestic strife—
That sorest ill of human life—
A plague so little to be feared,
As to be wantonly incurred?"

We most of us know what Courtship is, and so can better judge what it ought to be. With Courtship, society commits, as a matter of course, an endless string of sentimental wanderings and flagroe work. Man, when Courting, seems to be serving a most taxing and labyrinthian apprenticeship, with an employer, who is, in due time, to be superseded in command by the late apprentice. Where is the man who would not, with pleasure, day after day, and night after night, escort his mistress to balls, theatres, routs, &c. &c.? And where the woman, who would, for a moment, scruple to drag the blinded puppet after her, to do all the fal-lal work required, when out shopping, or in the ball-room? This, really and truly, appears to be the sum total of Courtship.



It is astonishing, too, to notice the many victims who, wide awake, fall into the trap. The women, with a multitude of examples before them—with a certain knowledge of the approaching change—willingly, resignedly, find that change theirs. They see the mistake of a near and dear friend "an unfortunate match;" and yet, trusting souls, they think themselves safe. He is a different sort of man—so kind—so very attentive. Or, if suspicion lurk about them for a while, they can't entertain it long; he makes another offer—another vow of love—calls the cherished one a little Venus—and she—poor weak heart, with a sort of it-can't-be-helped resignation—becomes a wife, and adds another to the list of those devoted creatures who bear the morning clock strike three, twice a week, with each time a firm determination of "not putting up with it."

It may not prove uninteresting or useless to consider for a moment the circumstances which may have made one of the aforesaid devoted creatures the victim of a great mistake. We will call our heroine Miss Smith. With a peculiar and earnest wish not to be considered personal, we do so—or, if anybody will find in herself the original Miss Smith, with a bland and courteous smile, we can confidently assure her, that the lady who sat for the portrait was a next-door Smith. Or if, unluckily, there should not be a Smith next door, the door after that is a safe reference. Well, having christened our heroine, proceed we to the same task with our hero: we have decided upon the sentimental cognomen Jones—and type shall be his godfather. We are not going, be it well understood, to work out here an elaborate plot, and so give an unearthly and impossible mystery to a plain and everyday occurrence: it would be like putting bad varnish on a good picture: it may look the better to uneducated and superficial observers, but, to the learned and attentive, the bad dressing will be an eyesore. To begin with then.

Miss Clementina Smith and Mr. Milkwhite Jones have met. They first saw each other at a friend's house—at a ball; and, as Milkwhite waltzed with the lovely Clementina, he felt that his sweet partner must extend the term of agreement, and become his for life. Poor fellow! Worse-fated Smith! Each evolution but strengthened the determination. And then Clementina! Who shall attempt to paint her—who be rash enough to vulgarise with ink the Smithian charms? She laughed and talked—talked and laughed: each word, each smile, driving sense from the brain of Jones. Mamma, with a trace of daughters to marry—grandpapas, with grand ditto's, also ripe for matrimony—uncles, with orphan and ugly nieces—all chuckled simultaneously at the perfect conquest. Said we that all looked smilingly upon the lovers? Apology is due, then, to a black-satined and jewel-bedecked group in a further corner of the apartment. They, poor souls, looked like sour milk upon the interesting scene. Not out of envy—for they all had many offers in their time—yet, strange to say, not one had been accepted. No! They had, for twenty years, looked with scorn upon the male of mankind—had withered, with a frown, the more presumptuous of the sex. Some whispered that the art of frowning had, by them, been learned so early, and had been so zealously cherished, so often practised, that, at five-and-twenty (some fifteen years ago) the accomplishment sat upon their brows, unmistakeable evidence of the further attractions within. Leaving the reader to decipher the feelings of the single bosoms, whose cherished faculty was frowning, be it at once declared, that in the minds of all those present at the eventful scene above depicted, a Smith had become a Jones!

The next morning following the ball beheld the postman standing at the door of John Smith, Esq. The said man of letters grinned knowingly as the door opened; he handed a note to the maid, and she smiled also, covered her greasy fingers with an apron, and, with all the delicacy she could muster, took the missive (gilded and perfumed) between her thumb and forefinger; she again grinned a responsive grin to the grinning postman, and closed the door.

The evening of the same day gave birth to a somewhat similar scene without the gate of Prince Lodge, the town-and-country house rented by the senior Milkwhite Jones. A boy, dressed in nothers and jacket to match, of that colour which comes under the peculiar denomination of pepper-and-salt, responded to the summons of the postman. The opened gate discovered the page of the Jones' establishment in his second best; which, as a facetious guest once remarked, time had despoiled of the salt, substituting the very best black pepper. Leaning his back against one post of the gate, and sliding his feet so as to prop himself steadily across the threshold, the liveried juvenile surveyed the little figure of her Majesty's deputy with complacency, and, may be, impudence. "Well, Walker, what's that for us now. Master's coming it rather strong in this railway dodge, arn't he?" said the youngster. The postman smiled, but said not a word. "What ha' yer got there, wrapt up in that out-and-out manner? Shares arn't so valuable as all that." "No," responded the postman; "nor them specs don't find such envelopes as this!" and the little man held forth a lace-paper letter. "I call that coming it strong, if you like." "My eyes! it just is," said the urchin, as he closely examined the paper: "it just is," he again repeated, as he discovered a flowered wafer. "Stay a minute, Walker; what's this here on the wafer? 'A, snail, to be sure, yer little mole, can't yer see that?' retorted the letter-carrier, as he rang the next-door bell. "Little! little!" shouted the boy, touched at the contemptuous allusion to his size. "Come, you arn't so big neither, my fine feller; so don't you talk." Satisfied with this rebuke, the small domestic closed the gate, and went to deliver the fragrant letter to Milkwhite Junior, for to that gentleman it was addressed.

Some half hour after the holding of the above refined conversation, the junior Milkwhite issued from his father's halls, evidently in high spirits. Twenty minutes of the intervening time might be traced in the whiskers and cravat of the devoted young gentleman; and yet he did not blush—did not, as he ought to have done, look as bright a vermilion as the blooming scarlet-runner—seeing the awful waste he had made of those twelve hundred seconds. He thought of the captivating Clementina; the wiles and smiles of that lovely female; the beauty of her writing; the exquisite sensibility of her heart. Her heart! How much knew he of the light and bounding thing! How could he tell, with such small experience, whether the soft and glowing substance which said it clung to him, would not, like Indian rubber, upon the slightest check, bound back and cling again elsewhere; find in its second clinging a like repulsion, only a weaker one; till, poor toy! worn out, each rebound being slighter than the one before it, the shattered, forgotten, wayward bauble, might, friendless and alone, grow dead. Such the coquette's heart—such often her fate.

"Deaf as a door-post" is Love. By many and devious ways does Cupid lure his victims; but, sometimes, he is straightforward, and, instead of vigorously burying his barb in the doomed bosom, he just scratches, and then leaves to the being scratched the heaving or enlargement of the wound. In the case of Milkwhite, Love was in a hurry indeed! The wound being given, Fancy undertook to keep it open for a time, so that, in a moment almost, it could be healed, cleansed, and leave not a sign of its previous existence. Wretched, most wretched generally, the poor mortals so stricken. Love may be aptly likened to a plant. It may be made to flourish for a time—may be forced so to do—it will be like the plant taken from its native soil and air, and reared with zeal and tenderness in a heated chamber. The plant waxes exceedingly; shoots forth from every branch a dozen others, and becomes one mass of fragrant flowers. It does thus much; the slightest blast blows on it and it dies. Such, too, the death of love, reared on other than its own proper sustenance, which is merit. Turn we from the vegetation slain by the blast to look upon that whose only warmth is the sun. See the hardy thing bend before, and gather strength from, the very element that has slain one of its ill-used family. It gives forth a goodly array of blossom; it puts forth branches, too—thick and well-formed limbs; and, husbanding its resources, withstands the withering frosts and sweeping hurricanes of later days. And so it blooms again and again; and, when natural decay overcomes it, still the seeds which it has scattered in early years, bloom around it, a comfort and an evidence of its past beauties. Such is the natural tendency of love.

As has been observed, Milkwhite, smiling as well as a tight cravat would allow him, emerged from Primrose Lodge. At the gate was met by an acquaintance, seemingly about his own age. And to such seeming the total absence of ceremony between the two friends gave strength. Disparity of years, as well as disparity of station, demands, whether with reason or not let others determine, at least some ceremony. Equality on all points can alone know the happy instruction of unreserved and pain intercourse. Marked by such universal equality were the few words that now passed between the friends. They were both at the ball of which mention has been made. The friend chuckled when he perceived the desperate hurry Milkwhite was in: he whispered something to the devoted youth, who, becoming a little, a very little, more ruddy, answered, "All right." A hearty shake of the hand put a fine to the meeting.

The reader shall not be wearied with a repetition of that "dearest," given with an emphasis, a copy-book full of lines (thus ones too) could but ill convey—that "lovely creature," repeated a dozen times as often as the clock strikes—those enchanting duets, when the lovely one's razor-edged voice screams about a lock of hair, to the flat—and very flat grumbling of the gentlemen about another lock of the same substance. Or, happy days! the young lady is asked once to play—somebody is sure she can play the overture to, and some of the music of, "Semiramide." "To be sure she can," simpers the mamma; and what's more, the young lady (obliging creature!) does. And now for the enamoured gentleman. Up, sir! turn over the leaves. The lady will have finished in an hour and a half, and will wonder "what in goodness has made you so tired?" The lady is going for a walk down Regent-street, Bond-street, Piccadilly, Burlington Arcade, and then, "just a turn in the park." Wouldn't you be ashamed to let her go alone? "Most kind to business—important business." You ought to be ashamed of yourself. "Can't the waltz be put off?" How dare you ask such a thing? Sir, sir! you must go—must put off ugly business—never mind the inconvenience—and do the fal-lal work—the price of your bride. In short, the second noon after the first morning of Milkwhite and Clementina was their honeymoon.

They have been married four months. Mrs. W. Jones, Jun., can go out alone—because she must; she can play the piano, without a gentleman standing for an hour and a half to turn over the leaves because she must; she can be contented—and only because she must be so. The gentleman does not ill-treat her; that is to say, he does not beat her, and she does not find his absence irksome. The love which used the superlative, now finds the positive shorter and more convenient; dearest, dear. In fact, they don't hate each other—but do they love? Has the forced plant sustained the blast? Can love—the holy, pure passion which God recognises as such, find a strong and lasting sanctuary in a few short weeks? Must not a passion, so sanctified, be tested rigorously tested—before two beings take upon themselves the happiness of another; cheating the one they choose, if other feeling than love promote that choice, and blessing it, if its merit—its goodness—has alone pointed it out as a fit companion?
